HANDEL AND BACH.

(From the "Ladies' Repository.")

Turning to Bach's oratorios, we at once see their instinctive difference from those of Handel. Bach did not, like Handel, seek his subject; it overpowered him. He had on public before him, longing for new things, and eager to hear new singers. He was a servant of the Church. His originality lies not in the choice, but in the handling of his theme. He tried to make his Church music accord with the service of God, and, through it, to give an echo of the words of prayer or praise.

His Cantatas, with subjects drawn from the Gospels, number one hundred. [The MS. scores of nearly three hundred lie in the Royal Library at Berlin.—ED.] His Passion and Christmas music has its appointed place in the Lutheran service, and no other music of the kind can compare with his. His St. Matthew's Passion is the most powerful of all his productions of this kind, and the best known.

As Handel's music can be understood only through a knowledge of his career in Italy and England, so Bach can be understood only by those familiar with the German school of music. Joyousness of tone and manner are the characteristics of Italian music; but the old spirit of German art, before all things, strives after character and truth. The words must have their full right; the music must only make them more clear and transparent. To bind words and manners harmoniously together, like body and soul, is Bach's great effort; and in it he has met with grand success.

The imperishable truth stands higher with him than the intellectual, beautiful form; therefore, he dares express the thought with the utmost boldness, sometimes even with harshness. Every melody is characteristic; no one chorus like another. This estranges from him many ears. "Bach is as rational as Goethe and Lessing, but not popular as Schiller and Mozart," has been justly said of him.

Bach's music is polyphonic, or many toned. The ears of many cannot bear this. There are people so sluggish in hearing and thinking, that they must have everything perfectly plain in music. Handel can accomplish this, but Bach cannot. Every voice forms a part of the great whole, and must stand alone. A chorus of Bach's is a great conversation of voices, where each must be silent when he has nothing to say, and fall in at the right time. Often in the beginning and concluding chorus we are obliged to follow two or three melodies at a time. It has been truly said: "Bach's music is like a primitive forest, full of grotesque growth and guarled branches. One should not send children into this wood."

Over-pregnant with thought and meaning, his music is especially the music of the future; still amidst all its depth, it contains a romantic element which makes it truly German. Whoever fully drinks in the spirit of his melodies, is as under a spell of enchantment. His orchestra, also, is different from Handel's; not only sustaining the music, but standing by it like its twin brother. Sometimes the sentiments are given to the voices at others to the instruments. The orchestra, as well as the voices, can interest of itself. In the beautiful words of Hiller:—"The orchestra of the St. Matthew's Passion is a fine veil, behind which a tear-moistened but most lovely face shines forth."

In this fine, spiritual orchestration, this man has indeed followers, but no predecessor. The few instruments are finely chosen, and gently and impressively they move the thought of the aria. In the Saint Matthew's Passion, flutes, harps, and organ have their place, but horns, drums, bugles and trumpets are not heard. Where Christ speaks, the string quartet usually softly accompanies; but at the words, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" even this is silent.

A mysterious power, depth, and spirituality are the signs-manual of Bach's music. It is as if he spoke to us of a better world. He touches our finest sensibilities. We give him our hand, and he leads us into an intricate labyrinth of tones, but securely we go on by the Ariadne thread, and our feet stand at last in the Holy Place.

The musical world of the present is full of the praise of John Sebastian Bach. It may not love the seriousness and transcendent depth of his music, but it honours the master whom Beethoven has called "The great father of harmony." Over his nameless and unknown grave, many a one whom his strains have called in spirit blessed, and in the concluding words of his Passion chorus, says:—

"Rest gently, gently rest."

To both Handel and Bach the Scriptures were the undoubted truth of God. No mortal could have written such music had he not believed. To the full measure of their powers they sought to serve and honour Him, but each in his own way. Handel should not be called the more worldly of the two, if the words are to be taken in their usual sense. Like Paul at Athens he preached God from a world stage—the living God of history, speaking in deeds and miracles. From the Scriptures he seized whatever would most deeply move the soul and knew how to present it in the best light. He could sing of the world's allurements and deceits, for he had known them all; and he could compass the whole scale of emotion, from despair to rapture, from the woes of death to the joys of heaven.

From his text he grasps, like Luther, the principal thought, and indelibly impresses it upon the mind of his hearers. He is the singer of the Old Testament, jealous for the Lord's house and honour—as Asaph in the temple court—his orchestra, the whole one hundred and fifty Psalms—his text-book; Moses and the prophets—and from the summit of David's mountain he gazes afar to the morning twilight of the great redemption.

Bach is a church believer, a pious man, who has God always before his eyes and in his heart. Not upon the theatre of the world, amid its honours and disgraces, its loves and hates, were unfolded to him the eternal truths of the Scriptures, but in a life of silent, blessed meditation, like that of a hermit in a forest sanctuary. He was a Lutheran, with an inward leaning towards a monastic life. Not the defiant Luther before the Imperial Diet, but Luther in the narrow cell, resembled Bach. A deep, mysterious spirit runs through his music, which shows that he—the Lutheran Cantor—was capable of writing a high mass.

The sympathetic element was not wanting in Bach—he, too, could sing of mortal loves, and hates, and passions, but this human sympathy was only the back-ground before which appeared the shining image of his Lord. Not what God does for men with the strong arm, but what God does for men in his love, in his inconceivable condescension, affects his heart. Spiritually to sink himself in this history, to embody its eternal substance in his harmonies, this was Bach's art. To him the smallest passage of the Scriptures is full of meaning. He is not, like Handel, a preacher to the multitude; his power is not on the stage, or in the concert-hall, but in the church. If over his utterances the veil of mystery lies, still he explores into a hitherto unexplored kingdom, only to let us know how inexhaustible its treasures are.

His music seems to be ordained not for the people, but for only a consecrated circle. And still this is only seeming. We unjustly call Bach "a solitary artist without a public," because he is too high and too deep for the multitude. He who only says what all understand, will, in the end, have said but very little; and he who says more, will not of necessity be always incomprehensible.

Bach's music is a giant, Gothic dome, in which a forest of mighty pillars of harmony swells upward, their branches crossing and interlacing each other in the most wonderful and intricate forms. Cross and crosier fail not, and through the windows, painted with scenes from sacred history, stream in the broken beams of day. Every encouraging feature feels, without comprehending the great structure in all its parts, that the spot whereon he stands is holy ground. This is the secret power of Bach's music. It is with this music as with the stars of heaven. The unlearned man feels their greatness and sublimity, but the astronomer, who knows their orbits and their course, admires and wonders still more.

Bach is the singer of the New Dispensation. He well knows how to sing of old things; but it is his delight to seek inspiration in the simple majesty of the Gospel, in the deep thoughts of Saint Paul. He knows the Lord as the king, the conqueror over death, and thus he represents him in that cantata for the sixteenth Sunday after Trinity; but still it is the mournful joy of the true Lutheran to stand under the cross of Jesus, to support his weary head, with gushing tears, follow him to the sepulchre, softly saying, "My Jesus, good-night!"

In Handel breaks forth from the burning bush an armed and mantled prophet before all the people, in Bach a silent priest goes into the Holy of Holies to light the candles, and burn incense before the Most High.

Two great masters have stood before our eyes, to comprehend whom in their deepest meaning it is given only to earnest souls. Handel and Bach have risen from forgetfulness, because in their works lies an eternal truth, which, though it may slumber for a time, can never die. To have brought these great masters from obscurity is an honour to our generation, but may heaven forbid that to this or any other age they shall be in their music, what they once were, witnesses of God against the degeneracy of the time!

DRESDEN.—A Royal decree, as it is called, asking for a grant of five hundred thousand thalers towards the erection of a new Opera-house has been laid before the Second Chamber, with an intimation that a further grant of two hundred thousand thalers will have to be demanded in the next budget. The demand is expected to meet with considerable opposition among the members of the Chamber.

A short time since, during the performance of the opera of Otello in Lyons, the regular order of things was diversified by a slight episode, which threat-ned at first to be attended with disastrous results, but which eventually served merely to excite the risible faculties of the audience. In the scene where the jealous Moor enters the chamber of the sleeping Desdemona, the lamp which he was carrying had ceased to be exploded, and the flaming spirit which escaped from it enveloped the hand of the too credulous Othello. The latter, forgetting his jealousy, ran to the table against which his unhappy wife's harp was leaning, and placed the lamp on it. But the spirit quickly set the harp and table-cloth on fire. Othello succeeded, however, in extinguishing the flames. Having effected this much, he began unconsciously to move his hand backwards and forwards, for the purpose of allaying the pain he was suffering. Seeing that he was not seriously injured, the audience burst into a hearty laugh, in which the unlucky Moor good humouredly joined. But, recollecting himself, he quickly resumed his gravity and proceeded to despatch his wife in the usual way.

A NEW EDITION OF MOZART'S OPERAS IN SCORE.

The above artistically-important enterprise undertaken by the firm of Breitkopf and Härtel in Leipsic, who have as length given us Mozart's operas critically revised, according to the original manuscripts, with an improved version of the Italian texts, met with universal appreciation on the appearance of the very first score—namely, that of Idomeneo. This was followed by the score of Die Entführung aus dem Serail, that ever fresh masterpiece in the comic operatic style. Whatever has been already said about the very admirable getting-up of this edition, about the legibility and correctness of the pointing, etc., as well as with reference to the revision carried out with comprehensive knowledge and artistic conscientiousness by Julius Rietz, applies with equal force to this second score.

With the exception of a few trifles the entire manuscript of this opera in Mozart's own hand has been preserved, though unluckily in a fragmentary form. The owners, Herr Paul Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, of Berlin, and Herr Karl André, of Frankfort-on-the-Maine, readily placed it at the disposal of the publishers. In Frankfort-on-the-Maine there are only detached portions, namely, separate instrumental parts. The fact that, though most of them have been preserved, some are lost, is accounted for by the circumstance that, when Mozart went through his autograph manuscript, he wrote upon paper with twelve lines, which was consequently not large enough for several pieces of the score. His manuscript exhibits—according to Rietz's description of it—less small corrections, but, on the other hand, a far larger number of abbreviations and additions than his later operas. The motive for them is not always to be seen, but we may assume that they were sometimes the result of his own convictions, though more frequently of the wishes expressed by the singers. The last is the more probable view of the case, if we take into consideration Mozart's position at that period in Vienna. The added passages are incorporated in the text of this edition, while those which have been erased are given as an appendix.

The autograph is, moreover, according to Mozart's custom, plain and beautiful, and written with the most painful exactitude, as regards the directions.

Despite this, however—as J. Rietz says in his preface, and we may rely upon his intimate knowledge of the subject—there is not one of Mozart's other operas, there is not one of his other works, which has been propagated either in a printed or manuscript form, in so distorted a state. In most of the ordinary editions of the score, there is scarcely a single piece in which, owing to carelessness, misapprehension, caprice, and impudent tampering, the most shameful variations from the original manuscript have not been introduced.

We must not seek the principal reason for this merely in the careless copies—among which must be counted piratical copies taken without permission—which were in circulation from the very first, we must seek it also in the many alterations made by Mozart, and in the fact that the instrumental parts were added, as we have stated, upon separate leaves, thus affording scope for mistakes, and the arbitrary arrangements of strangers. We must, too, not forget that it is precisely on the players that the great mass of those snobbish conductors who obtain their musical understanding and the boldness of authority when they assume office, have been able to practise their pleasant tricks uninterruptedly for the longest time.

With regard to a respectable number of the most glaring inaccuracies and distorted readings in the previous scores of this opera, we refer the reader to the preface in which Herr J. Rietz points out and traces the principal ones in the most interesting manner. Of course, the innumerable wrong directions of Forte and Piano, as well as of the peculiar stringed instruments to be employed, are not even mentioned.

This new edition of the scores of Mozart's operas must certainly not be classed among the speculations entered into by publishers to present day with old classical musical works. In the present instance, the publishers have contracted a debt of honour with the great master and with musical art, and the liquidation of that debt will indubitably demand, at the outset, considerable sacrifice. In the first place, such publishers can rely only upon a very limited number of professional musicians, and accomplished amateurs, libraries, and managers, as purchasers of the score. By-the-bye, as the last-named individuals are especially chary of incurring any expense which does not immediately ensure good houses, we must here publicly draw attention to the fact that managers of German theatres are bound in honour and justice to foster this undertaking, and, in conformity with the artistic task they should fulfil, to further it by all the means in their power. They alone are able to make the object of the publication a realised artistic fact, as far as the musical public are concerned, and, by the conscientious use of the revised scores on the part of their musical directors and conductors, to banish, once for all, from the performances of Mozart's operas, all the disfigurements, errors, and distortions of the text, which have characterized them for two generations.

The further means for carrying out such a course, a course on which the public is justified in insisting, and which musical critics would certainly warmly support and appreciate, may shortly be expected. According to report, the larger number of Mozart's remaining six operas have already been engraved, and will ere long follow the publication of the second.

C. DANCK.

THE NEW PARIS OPERAHOUSE.

Whatever the fate of the French Empire, it will leave behind it one monument, if not aere perennius, as lasting as iron and stone. If the Empire stamps no mark for good or evil upon French morals, intelligence, or politics, it will at least hand to posterity a new operahouse—an operahouse unrivalled as an expression of the spirit of the period. The Second Empire will live in stone, as a sermon on the characteristics of the French mind, so far as Napoleonism can influence that mind, when generations have passed away. Now, too, that the stains which defiled Carpeau's group have been effaced, it is only just that the English reader should be made acquainted with the merits of a building of such pretence and magnitude. If French architects are not at home in theatre-building, in what are they the masters of English architects, when the latter are not fettered by employers?

M. Garnier has produced the keenest satire upon the Empire, in giving architectural expression to those notions of the good, beautiful, and true, which he himself holds in esteem. The interior, though far from completion, is a masterpiece of arrangement; in other words, of French and Napoleonic organization. The entrances, vestibules, waiting-rooms, corridors, facilities for passing to and fro, vast space prepared for machinery above and below the stage, and iron-work construction of the whole are probably unrivalled. The space for the audience occupies one-seventh of the site, while the breadth of the proscenium, left to right, is about sixty-six feet. An arcade, with lofty colonnades in pairs, surrounds the principal staircase, and promises to turn out well, unless marred by capricious detail. The construction is of iron and stone, and the floors are of concrete. Turning to the general architecture of the fabric, the astonishment with which the eye is struck on first seeing it is quickened and deepened as the design is more closely scanned. The building looks massive as it is, on account of the enormous size of its various portions. Almost everything about it is too big. Every canon of design is violated. The ground story is immense in height; the next is much lower, and the highest rivals the most trumpery of London streets as "mansions." On the top is placed one of those huge square masses of stone, which the commonplace architect is utterly unable to connect with the rest of his design. The ground story is pierced with a series of huge, shapeless openings, termed windows—in which some excellent iron work has been placed to contain the glass. The weight of the superstructure thus rests on the weakest part of the building. What would have been said to such a device by Middle Age architects, it is not difficult to imagine. The mighty cavalcade at the chief entrance are of marble and bronze, indicrous in ugliness and violation of all principles of design. The building is, in truth, a monster of bizarrerie, fit only for reproduction in sugar, to be placed upon a gigantic cake at a festival given by a grateful municipality to the prefect of the Seine. The materials, on the other hand, are unexceptionable, the marbles various and beautiful, and the mechanical work unsurpassed in strength and finish.

The notorious group, so well blackened and so completely purified, is characteristic of the morale and practical blundering of the last eighteen years. Underneath a brief inscription on the right of the principal façade, which informs us that the Opera is the home of lyric poetry, are placed M. Carpeau's half-tipsy, naked bacchanals! On the left we learn that the Opera is also the home of the dance, and underneath appears another colossal group, intensely proper and clothed, meant to suggest the genius of poetry. While M. Carpeau's bacchanals abound with life and animal energy, the corresponding group is as dull as it is decorous. If people now believed in diablerie, who would not say that some demon had inspired the conception of these groups. On the whole, it is consolatory to English architects that new Paris, when producing anything less monstrous than M. Haussmann's streets and boulevards, breaks out into so startling a proof of the decay of French architectural genius. At the same time, we have not met with one Frenchman who does not condemn the building in unqualified terms. When completed (at the end of some four or five years), it will have cost, at the very least, two millions sterling.

STUTTGARDT.—Herr Franz Lachner's Catharina Cornaro has been successfully produced. Herr Scmthein sings the principal male character.

VIENNA.—Offenbach's new opera, Les Brigands, is to be produced at Herr Steiner's Theatre, and M. Offenbach will himself get up the work and conduct the first performance.

ST. THOMAS'S AMATEUR MUSICAL SOCIETY.

On Tuesday evening, the 21st ult., after the usual practice of members, a handsome clock, surmounted by a bronze bust of Haydn, and a pair of candelabra, were presented to the Honorary Conductor, Mr. Lovell Phillips. The Rev. R. P. Clemenger, President, occupied the chair, supported by Vice-presidents, Dr. R. C. Croft, Captain Elliot, J. Richardson, Esq., and Captain Seymour, the Committee, and many visitors. The Rev. Vicar, on rising, said—

"Mr. L. Phillips, I have been requested by the members of this society to-night to act as their representative, and feel honoured by that request, as it enables me to add my testimony to the esteem and regard in which you are held by all connected with this society. I might indulge in superlative eulogy, but I feel—and I am sure you will all agree with me—that facts are stronger than eulogy. And what are the facts? At the first concert of this society, over which you, sir, presided, there were twenty-four members present. Now —and but the short space of three years has intervened—the books show that there are sixty-two acting members and fifteen associates. And not only have you, sir, worked up the numerical strength of the society, but you have brought it into such a state of proficiency as to enable me to state, without fear of contradiction, that few amateur musical societies could be found in London to excel it. And now, sir, without further words, allow me to present to you this token of the society's regard and esteem. It is, I believe, a clock, and therefore, though I am afraid some of you will say it is not an original remark, a striking proof of their affection. With it are a bust of Haydn and a pair of candelabra. This is St. Thomas's Day, the patron saint of St. Thomas's Church, St. Thomas's district, St. Thomas's Musical Society, and of your humble servant, myself. And it is, too, the shortest day of the year. But though that is the case, I sincerely trust that the memory of this evening will not be of short duration, but will constantly remind you, not only of the reward of duty, but also of the affection in which you are held by the members of this society. I now, in the name of the society, present you with this clock, wishing you at the same time long life and happiness."

Mr. Phillips, on rising, was received with an ovation. He thanked the members of the society for their kindness, and assured them that as long as possible he should continue to hold the post of conductor. He thought, however, there were others to whom, more than to himself, praise was due for the present efficiency of the society. He alluded to the vice-presidents, especially Dr. Croft, who had taken such great interest in the society, to the committee, and the honorary secretary, all of whom had worked in such a manner as he knew, from experience, was most unusual in the offices of amateur musical societies. He thanked them for their great kindness, and trusted that they would believe that what he said was but a faint echo of what he felt—loud and prolonged cheering. The meeting then closed with three hasty cheers for the conductor. The clock bore the following inscription:—

"Presented to Lovell Phillips, Esq., by the members of St. Thomas's Amateur Musical Society, in recognition of his valuable services as Honorary Conductor, December 21, 1869."

For the information of some of our readers we may add that this society, which consisted three years ago of only a very few members, has, under the guidance of Mr. Phillips, so increased as to number nearly eighty, and the excellence of their singing is now so well known, that the applications for assistance to the various charities of the parish are more numerous than can be complied with. The society, however, exists only for good, and is always ready to help in any worthy cause.

THE "WOMEN'S CLUB AND INSTITUTE."—The object of this institution is to afford women a place of resort for society, rest, recreation, refreshment, and study. The Club contains a reading room supplied with newspapers and periodicals, and an English and foreign library; a drawing-room for society and conversation; a visitor's room, in which members can receive their friends; and a dining-room, where refreshments are supplied at moderate prices. There is also a circulating library and a music room for lessons and practice in connection with the Club (the latter under the direction of Miss Stevenson). A soirée was given at the rooms of the Institute (77, Newman Street, Oxford Street) on Tuesday evening, Dec. 21st, when a large number interested in its success attended. Misses Palmer and Buckland were the singers. Miss Palmer was recalled after Mr. Sullivan's "Will he come?" and encored in "Thady O'Flynn," for which she substituted "Katty Moyle." Mr. Hodgson Pratt's recitation of "The Battle of Armageddon," and Mr. Montague Bere's "Mrs. Caudle's proposal to keep her wedding day" were both features. A solo on the concertina, "Robert, toi que j'aime," by Mr. Bertioli, "The pied Piper of Hamelin" and Jean Ingelow's "The high tides," recited by Miss Lisle, were no less successful. Miss Stevenson played Schubert's Impromptu (Op. 142), and the Volkslied of Mendelssohn, with great applause. A pianoforte fantasia on airs from Il Flauto Magico, was well played by Miss Ruddock; and the duet, "Serbami ognor" (Semiramide), by Misses Buckland and Palmer, met with due appreciation. A collection of drawings, prints, and photographs, open to the audience, was found highly interesting.

ORGAN NEWS.

PROFESSOR OAKELEY gave an organ recital at Edinburgh on Dec. 24th. The following was his programme:—

Pastoral Symphony, Christmas Oratorio, Bach; Pastoral Symphony—recitatives: "There were shepherds abiding in the field," "And, lo, the angel," "And the angel said, Fear not," "And suddenly there was with the angel"—chorus, "Glory to God in the highest" (Messiah), Handel; "Gloria in excelsis," Pergolesi; Prelude (Pastorale) and Fugue in G major, for organ, Mendelssohn; Andantino (Moments Musicaux), Schubert; Pastorale, Kullak; chorus, "For unto us a Child is born" (Messiah), Handel.

The recital was, as usual, accompanied by interesting historical and explanatory remarks.

On Saturday and Sunday last, an organ, built by Mr. J. Hopworth, Queen Street, Clayton West, was opened at the Mount Zion Reform Chapel, by Mr. Fitton, Kirkburton. Selections from the Messiah were sung by an efficient choir. On Sunday, Mr. J. Lockwood, from Wakefield, presided at the organ, and brought out the varied excellencies of the instrument. The organ contains one row of manuals, CC to F in alto, enclosed in general swell (except the open diapason, part of which forms a speaking front), and pedal organ, CCC to E. It has 10 draws, viz., hautboy 8ft., open diapason 8ft., stopped diapason 8ft., dulciana 8ft., principal 4ft., flute 4ft., fifteenth 2ft., trumpet, pedal bourdon 16ft., pedal coupler; 3 composition pedals, and 29 German pedals. The case, which is of neat design, is stained, with illuminated front, and presents a very handsome appearance. The cost of the instrument is £120.

On Sunday week two sermons, in connection with the opening of a new organ, supplied by Mr. J. Hopworth, of Wakefield, were preached in the Methodist Free Church, Normanton Common. Selections from the Messiah were sung, and collections made.

THE following is the specification of an organ recently built in the hall of the New York Young Men's Christian Association, by Messrs. Odell Brothers. In some respects the instrument is a curiosity.

Over five hundred combinations can be made upon this organ, without touching a draw stop, or taking the hands off the keys. The drums, cymbals, bells and other auxiliaries, are entirely independent—to be used, or not, at the option of the performer—consequently do not interfere with the use of the instrument for classic or church music. Its mechanical arrangements and improvements are superior, both in number and quality, to those of any organ previously built in this country.

PROVINCIAL.

TODMORDEN.—The Weekly Advertiser, of December 18th, writes:—

"We do not hesitate in placing Dr. Spark's organ recital among the best performances ever given in this locality. The programme was admirably selected, the instrument was handled in a powerful manner, and each piece was given with the most discriminating taste."

BRIGHTON.—A Brighton journal writes as below:—

"Herr Adolf Sjödén, a Swedish professor of the harp, who has recently taken up his residence in Brighton, gave a matinée musicale in the King's Rooms of the Royal Pavilion. There was a full audience, and Herr Sjödén may be congratulated upon the result of his introduction to the Brighton musical public. He made a most favourable impression."

LINCOLN.—A correspondent writes as follows:—

"The Messiah was given here, on December 17th, in the Corn Exchange. Miss Annie Hiles, Mrs. Roberts, Mrs. Stubbs, the Messrs Pullein and Mr. B. Kelly being the singers. Miss Hiles fully established herself in the good opinion of the audience, who, in 'I know that my Redeemer liveth,' would willingly have heard her twice."

CHICHESTER.—A correspondent writes as beneath:—

"Mrs. John Macfarren's pianoforte and vocal recital came off on Wednesday, December 22nd, in the Assembly Rooms. The accomplished pianist who gave Beethoven's Moonlight Sonata, and a selection of pieces by Bach, Dussek, Rubinstein, Liszt, Wallace, &c., was applauded throughout, particularly after a tarantelle by Walter Macfarren, and a fantasia on popular Scotch airs by Brissac. Miss Henderson gave a new song by G. A. Macfarren, 'Come out and hear the waters shoot,' 'Oh, bid your faithful Ariel fly,' &c."

LIMERICK.—The Limerick Reporter writing about a recent concert given in this city, by Miss Kate Gordon, says:—

"Miss Gordon is amongst the best pianists we ever had the good fortune of hearing, and seems to throw her whole soul into every subject she takes in hands. Mr. Stanton sang his ballads with much expression, and had to comply on two or three occasions with the request of the audience to repeat them. The excellent band of the 70th Regiment performed at intervals, under the able conductorship of Signor Ragazzoli."

BARTON.—The Brixton Advertiser writes as follows:—

"Mr. Lazarus gave another vocal and instrumental concert in the Ball Room on Monday evening. The vocalist was Mdme. Thaddeus Wells, and the instrumentalists were Mr. Nicholson, Mr. Crosse, Mr. Lazarus, Mr. C. Harper, Mr. Wotten, and solo pianoforte and accompanist, Mr. Wm. Shakespeare, R. A. M. Mr. Lazarus well sustained his reputation. In 'Lo, here, the gentle Lark,' duet, flute and clarionet were happily blended. The bassoon and oboe solos were exquisite, and the singing of Mdme. Wells pleased as always."

CHELTENHAM.—The Cheltenham Looker-on mentions the success of the Cheltenham College Concert, given at the "breaking up" for the Christmas holidays:—

"The selection was of a light and cheerful character, suited to the youthful vocalists, who in the part-songs and other pieces aquitted themselves well, eliciting the applause of their school-fellows. Mr. C. Dennys received an encore in Brinley Richards' 'Cambrian Plume,' the chorus to which was rendered with spirit; Mr. Baxter, who sang the 'Brave Old Oak,' receivi g a similar compliment; as did flik-wise Master Maysey in 'La Legende du Verre.' The trio by M. D. Bucher, C. Vincent, and R. Williams, was one of the most effective of the evening's performances, the whole of which did the College Choir credit. An efficient band contributed to the success of the entertainment."

TORQUAY.—In the Torquay Directory we find the following remarks on Mr. Charles Fowler's recital of pianoforte music:—

"A pleasant musical afternoon was given at Mr. Fowler's residence, Villa Mentone, on Saturday the 4th December. The Sonata Pastorale, Beethoven; selection from Nuits Blanches, Heller; Rondo Brillante in E flat, Weber; Romanza and Allegro agitato, from third concerto W. S. Bennett; with a song from Madame Garcia, made up the first part. The second part opened with Mendelssohn's overture to A Midsummer Night's Dream, in which Mr. Fowler was assisted by a promising pupil, Miss Bessie Gedge. Among the following pieces were Beethoven's Sonata in F minor, Op. 1, also played by Miss Gedge; and a Spanish song from Madame Garcia, which gave much pleasure. The remainder of the programme consisted of pieces by Mr. Fowler:—A grand octave study; two sketches, 'Le Badinage,' and 'Queen Mab;' and 'Fun,' a tarentelle. The room was quite full."

ALFORD.—A correspondent writes from the Lincolnshire town as follows:—

"Mr. Henry Brown, organist of the parish church, gave his annual benefit concert recently to a large and appreciating audience. Miss Anna Hiles, when appearing in travelling costume (the train having been delayed by a snow-storm), was received with hearty acclamations. She was recalled after her two songs. The other singers were Miss Hargreaves and Mr. Dodds. Miss Hargreaves possesses a rich contralto voice, and sings with taste and finish. Mr. Dodds is well known to be a basso profondo of great merit. A young violinist, Mr. Kis, from scarborough, played several solos, and also took part in the Kreutzer Sonata; doing all in musician-like style. The concert gave general satisfaction."

LIVERPOOL.—We read as follows in the Liverpool Mercury, of a recent date:—

"The Societa Armonica in repeating the act of benevolence of last year (for the benefit of the Dental Hospital), gave a performance of the Messiah, at the Liverpool Institute, the proceeds of which will be handed over to the Childe-n's Infirmary. The commendable effort was completely successful, and the sum handed over will be worthy of the institution. The services of about eighty were given, the principals being Miss Monkhouse, Miss F. Armstrong, Mr. C. W. Robinson, and Mr. T. J. Hughes. Mr. H. Lawson was leader, and Mr. T. Armstrong, conductor. Both gentlemen fulfilled their duties in a manner which tended to the success of the work. As a whole the oratorio was admirably performed, and showed great improvement upon last year."

MAIDSTONE.—Mr. Tolhurst's Ruth was performed here on the 20th December, in the Corn Exchange; the soloists being Mdme. Rudersdorff, Miss Elphiustone, Mdme. Sauerbrey, Messrs. Crowe, Armes, and Mason Thomas; the conductor, Mr. Tolhurst himself. At the close of its notice the Maidstone Journal says:—

"Of the oratorio generally we cannot do otherwise than speak most favourably. It is written evidently with great earnestness, and is throughout well constructed and melodious. That it will ever take rank among our best compositions of the same character is too much to hope, but it is far above mediocrity, and its performance anywhere would ensure for it a favourable reception. At its termination on Monday night the composer was loudly called for, and on his return to the room was received with most enthusiastic applause."

MANCHESTER.—The Examiner and Times says thus:—

"We have much pleasure in calling attention to an amicable and original scheme for the gratification of musical taste and promotion of culture announced by Mr. J. Marsden, an accomplished local professor of music. In a promised series of eight pianoforte recitals instead of following the example of his former master, Mr. Charles Hallé, and of the eminent executants whose recitals in London have been strictly classical in purpose and selection, Mr. Marsden determined to consult the taste and meet the convenience of a considerable number of amateurs whose predilections are generally for pianoforte music which makes less demand on their intellect than the works of the old masters. At the first recital, he was favoured by a large attendance, and must have been much gratified with the result of what might be called his enterprising experiment. We have little doubt of the continued success of this commendable scheme."

Neither have we, and, therefore, the "enterprise" of Mr. Marsden is not apparent to us. The risk is on the side of those who prefer good music.

BELFAST.—A correspondent writes as follows:—

"Mr. Arthur S. Sullivan's Prodigal Son was given in the Ulster Hall on Friday, December 17th, by the Belfast Classical Harmonists' Society. There was a large audience, and the performance was a complete success. Mr. Cellier, friend and schoolfellow of Mr. Sullivan, conducted with great ability. This was the first performance of the work in Ireland. Mdlle. L. Van Noorden, Miss E. Fennell, Mr. Wallace Wells, and Mr. Orlando Christian, principal vocalists, were applauded in the solo music; the unaccompanied quartet, 'The Lord is nigh unto them,' was encored and repeated. The choruses were well sung. The second part of the concert consisted of a miscellaneous selection. The band, selected chiefly from Mr. Hallé's orchestra, performed Beethoven's Symphony, No. 2, the overtures to the Barber of Seville and Meanwhile. The vocal music was given:—As I view those scenes so charming,' Mr. Christian (encored); 'Ah, quel giorno,' Mr. Fennell; 'Tacea la Notte,' Mdlle. Van Noorden (encored); and 'Yes, let me like a Soldier fall,' Mr. Wells, (encor-d). The members of the society were encored in 'The Cloud-capt Towers.' Mr. Buck was leader, and Mr. A. M'Mahon, organist.

DUBLIN.—A correspondent writes of the Misses Glovers' concerts in the EXHIBITION Palace:—

"The most successful and agreeable concerts given in Dublin for a long time were those of the Misses Glover. Miss Emilie Glover has been heard occasionally at the Philharmonic and Italian concerts, but we were not at all prepared for the exquisite singing of her sister 'Lina Glover.' Such power of expression and quality of tone and style is rarely given to one so young."

MALVERN.—Apropos of a concert given on Tuesday week by the Choral Society, the Malvern News says:—

"We can congratulate the society on the very great progress they have made, thanks to their energetic conductor, Mr. F. Langdon. We can congratulate the society also on providing a pleasant entertainment. The programme was a good one; and we were glad to see the Rev. Alfred Fowler at his post as first flute, because he knows so well what to do. Mr. Lockett, as leader of the first violins, need his bow in a masterly manner, and Messrs. Athorne and Bovington did well at the piano. Mr. Haynes's music to 'Hark! the herald angels sing,' was sung with much spirit. It was composed for this concert, and knowing what Mr. Haynes can do, we trust it will not be the last of his compositions. We'll give him a challenge, that if he will write a glee or four-part song for the next concert of this society, we'll write another for the succeeding one—not to the same words, of course, but merely to give some little local zest to a society which deserves support. We are presuming the committee will accept ours. However, there's the challenge—now in the spirit of Christmas. If Mr. Haynes declines, we offer the same to any other lover of music. Some of the pieces were rather too heavy for the society, but the lighter ones went off with much spirit. It only requires practice to make the members do much better. If we might wish for them in their next concert or service, it is this—'implicitly obey your conductor.' We have had twenty years' experience with choirs and choral societies, and may, therefore, be supposed to know some little about the necessity of obedience to the conductor. You have done well, but you can do better."

DENDEE.—In his notice of the last concert given at the recent Festival, the Dundee Courier says:—

"The orchestral pieces were of a varied description, partly calculated to please the cultivated and partly the popular ear. The overture to Egmont was rendered with every justice. Mendelsohn's march from Athalie was also given with a true conception of its meaning. Of a different class was the two step movement which the second part of the programme opened and finished. Il Trovatore was chosen to have selected from it a number of most attractive pickings. The whole of the vocal force was brought into requisition at the last of the concerts. Madame Sainton-Dolby made her farewell appearance in Dundee. Her songs were 'Children's Voices,' with chorus, and 'Caller Herrin'.' Claribel's song was heartily received. 'Caller Herrin' was sung, as was also 'Children's Voices,' with much pathos. The loss occasioned by the retirement of Madame Dolby will not easily be repaired. We have already referred in terms of praise to Miss Wynne's vocalization, and our opinion was borne out in every re-pect by her rendering of 'Softly sighs.' Mr. Lewis Thomas was the only other solo singer, and the style in which he gave 'Largo al Factotum' was a treat. Mr. Carrodus' ordinary enthusiasm exhibited. Mr. Thomas re-appeared in obedience to a prolonged summons, and although he pointed to his throat and rejired, this would not satisfy the audience, for he had again to return and express his regret that on account of hoarseness he would be unable to respond to their encore. The duet and the sestetto from Don Giovanni were given—the former by Madame Rita and Mr. Cummings—in the most refined and careful style. M. Sainton played 'The Last Rose of Summar,' which lost none of its sweetness, while Wallace's variations upon it were executed as only such violinists as M. Sainton can execute them. Mr. Thomiess acted as accompanist with skilful hand and attentive mind. In closing our notices of these concerts, we have to express the thanks due to Mr. Nagel for carrying out so magnificent a musical festival. Mr. Nagel has brought before the public many of the works of Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Mendel-sohn, Donizetti, Bellini, Verdi, and others, has conducted with ability, and has been well seconded by the orchestra under Mr. Carrodus."

BRISTOL.—The Messiah was performed on Boxing-night at the Victoria Rooms, under Mr. Harrison, and, also, at the Colston Hall, under Mr. P. J. Smith. The former place was not, and the latter was crowded. Of both renderings the local critics speak at length. One says:—

"The oratorio at the Victoria Rooms was meant to enlist the services of Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Madame Patey, Mr. Patey, and Mr. Sims Reeves. A handbill, however, was circulated, stating that Mr. Sims Reeves was so unwell that he could not sing, but that Mr. George Perren had been obtained in his place.—The Philharmonic Society was patronized at Colston Hall by a crowded house. The solo parts were undertaken by Madame Sainton-Dolby, Miss Edith Wynne, Miss Elena Angele, Mr. Cummings, Mr. Lewis Thomas, and Mr. Maybrick. The oratorio went off on the whole satisfactorily. Madame Dolby was cordially received. Her voice still retains an amount of power and attractiveness surpassed by few. It had been announced that the fair vocalist would make her final appearance in Bristol last night, and doubtless not a few were present to bestow upon one so long an ornament to the profession. Miss Edith Wynne's best effort was 'I know that my Redeemer liveth.' Mr. Lewis Thomas is well known in local musical circles. His finished style, combined with the complete command he has over a voice which, for the richness of its tone and volume, is so remarkable, commanded the admiration of all. Mr. Cummings was painstaking as ever, and everything he e-sayed resulted in succ-ss. Mr. Harper, the trumpeter—for where is his equal to be found?—played the solo in 'The trumpet shall sound' magnificently, and was warmly applauded."

MADAME PAREPA-ROSA IN AMERICA.

(From the "Missouri Republican," St. Louis, Dec. 11, 1869.)

DE BAR'S OPERAHOUSE.

The rain fell like a second deluge last night, and the streets and avenues of the city were transformed into canals of liquid mud, but in spite of all unfavourable influences the theatre was packed above and below, seats, halls, and lobbies, with as splendid an audience as we have ever seen within its walls. And to this audience Verdi's opera of Il Trovatore was pre-ented in a manner worthy of that master-piece of musical genius. The cast was admirable, embracing the best material of the troupe, and the parts were distributed with so nice an appreciation of the qualifications of the various persons for the works assigned them, that not a single blemish occurred to mar the perfect beauty of the whole. Leonora was interpreted by Parepa, and we think Verdi himself would have shouted "bravo" had he witnessed the central figure of his opera set in so fair a guise. The prima donna was lost and forgotten in the loving, devoted, passionate woman which she represented, and every movement, every gesture was fashioned so closely upon nature's pattern, that it required an effort of the reason to convince the spectator he was gazing only at a counterfeit presentment and not at the original. We have spoken so warmly hitherto of Parepa's voice that further praise is useless, even could we find words in which to shape it. Song—deep, melodious, heart-thrilling song—is simply the natural language of this great artist. It bursts from her lips as freely and as purely as the spray from a fountain, the perfume from the flowers, laughter from happy children, tears from pitying womanhood. She is a crowned priestess in the Temple of the Muses, and sings with the same impulse which sends the lark to carol its matin hymn at heaven's gate.

This afternoon Fra Diavolo is given, and this evening the prima will make their farewell appearance in the Bohemian Girl—Parepa as Arline.

MR. GEORGE PERREN'S BENEFIT.

The season of English opera was brought to a close at the Crystal Palace by a performance, on Thursday last the 16th ult., for the benefit of Mr. George Perren, under whose direction the operas have been given. The theatre was crowded. The operas were Lucia di Lammermoor and The Waterman, the characters being sustained by Madame Florence Lancia and Mr. George Perren. Between the parts Mr. Perren appeared before the audience and said:—

"Ladies and Gentlemen,—I should be wanting in common gratitude and proper feeling if I did not thank you most heartily for this magnificent gathering. The question has often been asked, 'Can English opera find a home in this country?' It is said that it cannot; but in my presence here gives an emphatic denial to such an assertion. And why should it not succeed? Are there not able exponents of the works of our great masters? Need I remind you of a Clara Novello, or Catherine Hayes, or Braham, and, to come to our own time, of the greatest singer of the present day, on whom his mantle has fallen, Mr. Sims Reeves? (Loud cheers.) Or of that illustrious singer, who has no equal, Mr. Santley? And of lady singers, Madame Lemmens-Sherrington and Miss Louisa Pyne? And, last, I may mention the efforts of our own company, who have all worked most earnestly in the cause. (Great cheering.) I must not, however, forget our captain, who has brought us nobly into the haven of success, Mr. Manns (immense cheering); and his band, too, unprecedented in Europe, who have always cheered us on by their kindness as well as by their talent. And, ladies and gentlemen, now from the utmost recesses of my heart, in all sincerity I thank you for your great kindness to me. This occasion I shall never forget. We are about in part for a short recess, and permit me to wish you a merry Christmas and a happy new year."

The speech was received with enthusiasm.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

SHIRLEY BROOKS.—Yes. We remember it well. The dinner took place at the Earl and Shoulder, Axminster. The ménu consisted of Halibi cheap, Schalgeiger cheese, Tafilat dates, Kentish cobs, rolled ox-tongue, &c. But the song given by Dr. Spider, who was in the chair, ran otherwise than our correspondent seems to be aware. The first couplet was as thus:—

"A shepherd asleep may lose his sheep,
But a shepherd awake won't lose his cake."

We forget the rest, though we cannot forget the music to the song—by E. J. Loder—which had already been used in an anthem.

DILETTANTE.—Mdlle. Vaneri sang in the Italian Opera at Drury Lane Theatre when Mr. E. T. Smith was manager. She is now with M. Bagier, at the Italiens, in Paris.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 1, 1870.

THE BRISTOL TRAGEDY.

WE have just been reminded upon what an uncertain tenure those who frequent theatres and concert-halls hold their lives. The danger is none the less real and constant, because seldom manifest. In the crowd of decorous or hilarious pleasure-seekers there may appear no cause for dread. Everybody on good terms with everybody else is, rather, suggestive of unwonted security. But, as a matter of stern and, sometimes, terribly illustrated fact, there needs but one of a hundred contingencies ever lurking on the outskirts of a mob, to turn pleasure-seekers one against the other in a mad struggle for dear life. Thoughtful men ponder this thing now and then, and the more they do so the more are they amazed that the possibility of such a catastrophe is so often overlooked. A chain is no stronger than its weakest link; and the efficiency of any arrangement for the security of crowds must be measured by its adaptedness to the most trying circumstances. As a result, only here and there can we observe any efficiency at all. Those who design our places of amusement are satisfied to meet ordinary requirements. They appear to believe that audiences can never do otherwise than walk deliberately in, and, as deliberately, walk out. Hence the "man-traps" with which our cities abound:—places where the difficulty of entrance to an eager mob is only exceeded by the difficulty of exit. The fatuity of architects is strongly illustrated in the Bristol catastrophe. How the theatre may be adapted to allow a speedy clearance of its interior we know not; personal observation, however, has convinced us that, with regard to speedy filling, the designer has triumphantly shown "how not to do it." If he had deliberately set himself to arrange for the slaughter of Boxing-night, he could hardly have been more successful. In the first place, the entrances to pit and gallery are close together, and reached by the same passage. This, of course, secures on one spot the greatest possible concourse of people least accustomed to self-restraint. Next, the entrances are at right-angles to the passage; that to the gallery being on the same side as that to the pit, and further from the street. By this ingenious arrangement are entailed slow ingress and a necessity for the gallery frequenters to fight their way through those of the pit. Lastly, as if to take every precaution against safety, the passage has a considerable slope, making descent to Avernus easy, and throwing upon the unfortunates at the bottom the weight of those above. Looking at these things, the whole matter becomes clear enough. An eager crowd, fiercely struggling for admission under such circumstances, could hardly avoid involuntary homicide. So, when the unfortunate passage was cleared, horrified by-standers counted eighteen dead.

It may be that the Bristol victims will not have perished in vain. Their deaths should direct attention to the provision generally made for public safety at places of public resort. In this matter, as in so many others, authoritative supervision, regulated by stringent enactment, is much needed. Supervision of some kind exists, but its exercise can hardly give umbrage to architects and proprietors, who seem to do pretty much as they think fit. Under a proper arrangement, for example, Exeter Hall would not be allowed to remain as it is a week longer. Time and again have its dangers been pointed out, yet those dangers remain; and at every Sacred Harmonic Concert the lives of hundreds hang, so to speak, upon a thread. There is no exaggeration in this statement. Exeter Hall, with its audience in a panic, would repeat the horrors of Valparaiso without the flames.

Another improvement is suggested by the Bristol accident—to wit, the enforcement of order among crowds waiting admission.

Digitized by Google

We do not say that an English mob is more brutal than any other; but an English mob is, nevertheless, always brutal. The intense selfishness of its members, when striving for a common object, and the reckless cruelty which that selfishness entails, are of a disgusting order. Here is a matter for police interference. The public must be protected against itself, especially in the interest of its weakest members. For this reason, we see no valid objection to the French arrangement, which at once secures order, and puts all on an equality. Its enforcement might at first give trouble, though not more than a few extra policemen could easily surmount. Afterwards, we believe, the accruing benefit to everybody would be so obvious that the system might be left to work of itself. In any case, the matter requires attention. Nothing should be left undone which is likely to prevent wholesale slaughter like that at Bristol.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

Mr. C. G. Verrinder's choral class gave a musical evening at Westbourne Hall, on December 22nd, whereat the following artists appeared among others:—Miss Grace Aguilar, Madame Andrea, Mrs. Abbott, Miss Grace Lindo, Madame Debenhams, Messrs. Elmore, Nobile, Rye, Le Messurier, and Matthews. The programme, a long and varied one, calls for no special remark. Mr. Verrinder and Miss Grace Aguilar conducted.

Herr Lehmeyer's first pianoforte chamber concert, on Wednesday last, had a good attendance. Herr Lehmeyer played a solo of his own ("La Foret"), a sonata by Mendelssohn for pianoforte, and a duet for the pianoforte (with Mr. Chandau Lane) on themes from Faust. Several of Herr Lehmeyer's pupils played with success excerpts from the works of Weber, Spohr, Heller, and Mendelssohn. Miss Blanche Reeves and Madame Montserrat were the vocalists. M. Francesco Berger and Mr. Henry Parker were at the pianoforte.

Madame Berger Lascelles' first amateur vocal performance took place on Tuesday evening at her residence, 3 York Street, Baker Street Square, before a full audience. The first part consisted of a selection from Rossini's Messe Solennelle, including the "Kyrie," "Gloria," "Gratias," "Sanctus," "O Salutaris," and "Agnus Dei," which last was given admirably by Madame Berger Lascelles. The second part consisted of selections from the works of Francesco Berger, Bishop, Campana, Costa, Mozart, and Vincent Wallace, for the most part admirably interpreted by amateur pupils of Madame Berger Lascelles. M. Francesco Berger accompanied.

Mr. Aguilar gave at his last performance of pianoforte music (December 16th), the following programme:—Sonata in F (Op. 10, No. 2), Beethoven; "Bénédiction de Dieu dans la solitude," Liszt; La Gelosia (Ilonda brillant), Miss Emily L. E. Wright, pupil of Mr. Aguilar); Study in E flat (by desire), Thalberg; Romanza, Aguilar; Sonata in A minor, Aguilar; Lieder ohne Worte, Mendelssohn; Fantasia on Maanniello, Thalberg (Miss E. E. Wright); "Appeal," "In a Wood on a Windy Day" (Transcriptions), Aguilar; Pensée fugitive, and Mazurka, Aguilar.

Miss Edwards gave a musical afternoon on Thursday, the 16th ult., at her residence, 100, Ebury Street. A capital programme was drawn up, commencing with a selection from the Messe Solennelle of Rossini, the solos of which were executed by Miss Edwards, Madame Montserrat, and Mr. Henry Gordon (pupil of Signor Portes, of Paris), who possesses a good tenor voice, and who sang "Domine Deus" remarkably well. The "Qui tollis" received every justice from Miss Edwards and Madame Montserrat. The latter also gave "Agnus Dei." Miss Edwards sang the "Crucifixus." The ballad from Hamlet, and a new waltz, "The Naiads." She also played Ascher's fantasia, "Alice." Mr. Henry Gordon sang "Adelaide," and Duggan's new ballad, "Why breathe that sigh?"; and Signor de Rono played some solos on the violin. Sig. Pilotti accompanied.

At a concert given by Herr Carl Heuse, the composer and pianist, at the Hanover Square Rooms, on the 16th inst., the singing of Mdme. Chamerozow was highly successful. This young lady made her first appearance in public at Mdme. Arabella Goddard's pianoforte recitals in St. James's Hall, but she had then barely recovered from severe illness. She however proved by her second appearance, that she possesses a sympathetic soprano, with the agreeable addition of a good method. She gave a ballad by Carl Hause, "There grew a little flower once," and a brilliant air from Auber's Concert à la Cour. She was recalled after both. Mdlle. Bauermeister also sang a ballad by Herr Hause, "The chain I wore." The concert giver played his own "Souvenir de Thuringen," and a Duo concertante for two pianofortes, with Herr Schratzenholz. Herr Hause was further aided by Signor Piatti and Herr Ludwig (violin).

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

In a general article on the Christmas performances of the Messiah, by the Sacred Harmonic Society (two), Mr. Barnby's Choir, Mr. G. W. Martin's National Choral Society, and Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir (principal singers from Madame Sainton-Dolby's "Farewell Tour" party) the Pall Mall Gazette has the following exordium:—

"The performance of the Messiah at St. James's Hall on Christmas eve was the fifth on a 'grand' scale in seven days. They all attracted large audiences, and there seems no reason to doubt that forty would have done the same. Popularity so unbounded is worth looking at, because there is nothing like it in the world of art. Only to a partial extent do adequate causes appear. The subject of the oratorio is one which strongly affects large classes whose permitted modes of recreation are few; and the music of Handel is on all sides held worthy of its theme. But those who hear the Messiah to gratify religious sentiment are, probably, a minority; while very few, we imagine, listen from beginning to end without weariness. Every number is so familiar that only an exceptional rendering can sustain interest throughout; and no other audience puts itself in a posture of endurance so complete, or shows an earlier tendency to struggle away in twos and threes. Yet the oratorio is much more certain than any other to draw a crowded house. Does an explanation of this lie in the fact that hearing the Messiah savours of decorous respectability akin to that of hearing sermons? If Handel's work has been made into a musical fetish which one must venerate, and to which one must sacrifice, the whole matter is clear enough. The English public does what is expected of it as all such points with exemplary fidelity, and often affects amazing enjoyment from the task. Happily the Messiah, if a fetish, is one of a beneficent order. Some of its aspects nobody would think of reproducing now, but others lapse of time can never make old-fashioned."

The Pall Mall speaks encouragingly of Madame Sinico's début in oratorio:—

"At the performances of the Sacred Harmonic Society, the chief feature was Mdme. Sinico, who made her first essay in sacred music. The result was encouraging, and for that reason not surprising to those acquainted with the lady's talent and versatility. Mdme. Sinico gave the airs with a regard for the text and an absence of self-display which showed that she has studied upon a new department of her art in the right spirit. Whether she is endowed with the means of adequate expression time must decide; but even for this the encore awarded to 'I know that my Redeemer liveth' suggests hope."

With regard to Mdlle. Christine Nilsson the writer is consistent in his eulogy:—

"We need not repeat our estimate of her singing; and it will be enough to state that a crowded audience again recognised an interpreter of the Messiah gifted with every qualification for her work."

The consideration of Mr. Barnby's performance suggests to him a contrast—

"between the effect of 800 executants and of 700 of the Sacred Harmonic Society. The former is of interest because nearly approximating to what was a Messiah performance in Handel's day. That the master had in view colossal effects nobody doubts. How far he anticipated the means of his time by the character of his music 300 performers give an opportunity of judging."

Those of Mr. G. W. Martin and Mr. Henry Leslie suggest another:—

"The Messiah of the Sacred Harmonic Society is a continued struggle between band and chorus; that of Mr. Martin gives the chorus its own way. Not a few amateurs object to the former; and it must be a consolation for them to have the latter at command, provided they can tolerate an orchestra which makes up in independence what it wants in power. * * * * *

"How far the high training which Mr. Leslie's Choir has undergone is specially useful in oratorio remains undecided, some arguing for the less refined vigour of Exeter Hall. In any case, it is well to have the two renderings, because, while the majority may love energy, not a few prefer polish."

Our able contemporary will find both sentient and dissentient voices. Let him make the best of each. Neither can greatly hurt his argument.

Leipsic.—A fifth Suite by Herr Franz Lachner was most favourably received at the eighth Gewandhaus concert. M. Delaborde, pianist from Paris, performed several pieces, among them being Chopin's "Concert-Allegro," and Bach's "Toccata" in F major; but he failed to enlist the sympathies of the audience. Mdme. Walter Strauss sang an air from Don Juan, as well as a recitative and air from Judas Maccabæus. The orchestral piece was Cherubini's overture to Medea. The programme of the ninth concert included a novelty in the shape of a Symphony in C major, by Herr Vierling, of Berlin. It did not meet with a very flattering reception Mdme. Peshka Leutner sang a soprano solo, and the band also performed the overture to Oberon.

THE DEVIL AS A MUSICIAN.*

That the results of the ominal spirit of a people, manifested in the form of the myth, very frequently, under utterly different conditions, at different epochs, and among perfectly different races, exhibit a strange similarity, exceeding even to the details, is a fact that might be proved by hundreds of examples. I will merely mention the Tell legend, which is to be met with in various countries, as in Denmark, for instance, and that, too, several centuries earlier than in Switzerland. This phenomenon is still more striking in such myths as concern well-known historical individualities, and first sprang up when whatever happened was handed down by a thousand pens from the Present to Posterity. Tartini is not the only person who to a dream fiddled with the Devil for a bet, and transcribed the opponent's performance for us as the "Devil's Sonata." The same thing is recited of another musician, quite as important among his own set to his own age—the genial Ibrahim of Mosul, Court Singer of the Caliph, Haroun Alraschid in Bagdad.

Ibrahim had begged a holiday to sacrifice at home to Bacchus and Venus. As he was seated, to the midst of his wives, at table, he perceived—de-pite the orders given to the porter that he was to admit to one—an old man enter the apartment. Notwithstanding his dissatisfaction, Ibrahim greeted his visitor, and begged him to take a seat. Having entered into conversation with him, on history and poetry, Ibrahim, to his surprise, found the old man well informed to everything connected therewith. The two drank together, and, at last, the old man asked Ibrahim to do something for their amusement. "Ibrahim, my boy, sing us something; something you have sung to kings and others!" Ibrahim felt angry at the unbecomingly familiar way in which he was addressed, but he sang notwithstanding. After he had concluded, he received, however, only the same praise conveyed in the words: "Very good, oh, Ibrahim!" When he made no reply to this impolite behaviour of his uninvited guest, the latter continued: "Will you not sing something else? Do what you can, and I will afterwards imitate your example." Ibrahim exerted himself to the very utmost, and sang as he had never sung before. When he had finished, the old man praised him, and begged permission to sing in his turn. Ibrahim consented, but thought to himself: "What a fool, to wish to sing after me!" The old man preluded, and then sang several songs, so beautifully that Ibrahim was perfectly transported with delight. When the old man had concluded, he said: "Oh, Ibrahim, remember these songs, and teach them your maidens." He then suddenly vanished.—All present were affrighted; all had heard the beautiful strains. They ran to the doors, but found every one of them securely locked. The door-keepers had seen nothing of any old man. Ibrahim, immersed in thought, returned to his seat, when suddenly a voice from one corner of the room whispered to him: "All (and searching is of no avail; I am Iblis" (the Devil). "It was I who was your guest."—Ibrahim resolved to profit by what had occurred. He rode off to the Caliph, related the circumstance, and had to sing him the "Devil's Song." Haroun, in his turn, was entranced with them; fell to carousing with Ibrahim; and trusted that he, too, might hear the Devil sing.

Ibrahim was of Persian stock, while the leading musicians of that day in the Caliph's dominions were Nabatheans (from the southern part of Mesopotamia). When twenty-three years old, Ibrahim ran away from his home, and led a genial, but very rough life, as a leafer, or rather a robber. In the society of kindred spirits, he lay in ambush on the highways, pillaged travellers, and spent the booty in dissipation. This period was so far useful to him that he learned many songs from his companions. Leaving the district where he then was (the neighbourhood of Mosul), he made his way to Persia, and accidentally attracted the attention of an emissary of the Caliph. He was ordered to sing to the official, who gave him a sum of money, with which he went to Obolla, and perfected himself under a celebrated master. The Caliph Almehdi then summoned him to the Court in Bagdad, and gave him an honourable appointment. Ibrahim led a very merry life, but was particularly fond of wine. Despite the warnings of the Caliph, he would not reform, and at last that potentate ordered him to receive three hundred blows with the stick, so that, as he himself says, "the world appeared to him yellow, red, and green." The Caliph further commanded him to be imprisoned; and, for a time, placed in a coffin and put in a tomb. Ibrahim escaped, however, and remained concealed, not reappearing till Almelidi was dead, and Haroun Alraschid, Caliph. He was restored by the latter to his former dignity, and continually being presented with the most costly gifts. Haroun was a passionate admirer of his singing, and had him nearly always in immediate attendance. When Ibrahim died, the Caliph made his own son recite the prayer over his corpse.

Songs were then handed down orally, the master singing them over and over till the pupil remembered them. Many singers used to purchase female slaves, whom they taught and then sold for large sums to amateurs. Cases are sometimes said to have occurred though, when a singer practised a melody, to gain money by singing it to the Caliph, and another listened under his window until he, too, knew the melody, and then, running off, sang it at Court, and thus gained the advantage over the original singer. As a rule, singers were but very lightly esteemed, a fact for which they had probably to thank their mode of life.

BISHOP HOPKINS AND THE HOPKINSES V. EVERYBODY.

We take the subjoined spicy article from the New York Musical Review:—

"The Orphoenist and Philharmonic Journal, the first number of which has just reached us, objects to everybody and everything—excepting C. Jerome Hopkins, the Rev. John H. Hopkins, and the late Bishop of Vermont, whom we take to be Bishop Hopkins, the father of C. Jerome. Etiquette would have placed the father first; but the business sign of C. Jerome must read thus:—C. Jerome Hopkins, Rev. John H. Hopkins, and father. 'Ourselves' and 'we' whenever alluded to, are italicized. This does not occur once only. On page two is an article which is hard upon the directors of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, more particularly one of them, Mr. George W. Warren, who wrote a mazurka called the 'Little Gipsy' but the 'Wind Demon' by C. J. H. Next, the Review catches it; but as our particular griefs do not concern the public, we will forbear to wipe our eyes on it. The next notice is to the effect that (our) C. Jerome Hopkins 'did play and conduct as well as our poor abilities and hearty laughter, would allow' in Boston. Twiglit gets mangled next. Dr Peck gets a hard rub for wearing kid gloves 'at an 'oratorio' as conductor. Bernard Boekleman comes in for a column, in which his grammar, 'business,' local habitation and name are rather indefinitely handled. F. L. Ritter gets a goodly share of 'knock down.' Mr. Ritter who has the largest musical library in the country, comprising 3,000 volumes, in all languages, and who has written several symphonies oratorios, overtures, classic songs, pianoforte pieces, and concertos for almost every instrument, dares to lecture on the subject of music! Poor Mr. Ritter, we believe, has abandoned the idea on account of these strictures in the Orphoenist, and will only appear on the nights announced. The recent so called 'National Musical Convention' gets the next canister—in which a statement is made that 'we, (Hopkins and the Hopkinses) feel like the Pharisee and are inclined to thank Providence 'that we are not as other men are.' Other men are alike thankful for this arrangement. The Messrs. Steinway & Sons then get a shot. They unfortunately own a hall and organ, a 'wheezy,' 'asthmatical' old machine. But the organ of the Young Men's Christian Association is praised on account of a 'drum and bell accompaniment' which it contains. 'These novelties,' says the Orphoenist, consist of a 'bass drum,' 'side drum,' 'cymbals,' a 'complete set of bells,' and an attachment by which to imitate a hail storm!' And the Steinways are asked to furnish another kindred monster of discord. St. Cecilia forbid! Happily Hopkins cries havoc in vain. As was the case with Benedick, 'nobody regards him'—save for merriment, and the marvel is that he will still keep talking."

WAIFS.

The Monday Popular Concerts will be resumed on the 10th of January, with the welcome return of Mme. Arabella Goddard, whose style is so identified with the poetry of the piano, and not with its hammering. Herr Straus is to be first fiddle, Piatti and Paque violoncello, Ries second violin, and Zerffi viola. W. Friedemann Bach's Pianoforte Fantasia will be played by the Queen of Pianists, who will be associated with Piatti in Mendelssohn's Sonata in D major. As Beethoven's Septet and Schubert's Quartet in C major are composed in this scheme, it is evident that it will be a "sensational" evening.—The Queen, Dec. 25.

The provisional theatre at Dresden has been opened with Gluck's Iphigenia in Tauris.

Prince Poniatowski is preparing his opera, Pierre de Medicis, for the Carnival season at Milan.

Madame Volpini has been singing in Faust and the Traviata at Mocnow, and been received with enthusiasm.

Herr Lehmeyer commenced a series of six concerts at the Store Street Music Hall on the 22nd.

Wachtel terminated his Paris engagement by playing Elvino in the Sonnambula. Mdlle. Semi was the Amina.

Verdi will pass the winter in Genoa. Offenbach is to Vienna, producing his Princesse de Trebizond.

Wagner's Phantom Ship has been produced at Rotterdam, and his Maîtres Chanteurs at Weimar.

The Italian Opera at Brussels has failed. Concerts have been given for the relief of the artists.

Herr Stockhausen, the bass-baritone, it is said, is engaged by the directors of the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, for their forthcoming season.

Messrs. Ketterus and Goffrie announce a provincial tour next month, with the sisters Doria, Mdlle. Jarvis Rubini, Herr Kreutzer, and M. Paque.

ITALIAN OPERA AT DRURY LANE.—All difficulties about the Italian Opera being housed in the forthcoming season at Drury Lane Theatre have been surmounted.

Mario has resumed his professional duties in St. Petersburgh, his three daughters are with him. Adelina Patti has been playing in Figlia del Reggimento, Calzolari and Gassier being the other singers.

In consequence of the great success of the carol concert given by the parish church choir, at Wakefield, last year, a similar concert—says the Wakefield Journal and Examiner—was to be given on Christmas day.

The 250th anniversary of the birth of Racine was celebrated at the Théâtre-Français, by the performance of Mithridate and the Plaideurs; at the Odéon, by Athalie, the fifth act of Phèdre, with the recital of Théramène by Beauvallet, and the Plaideurs.

Madama Sainton-Dolby's farewell provincial tour ends early in February. She will close her distinguished musical career next June, giving, meanwhile, ten concerts of English music on the 7th and 14th of January, in St. James's Hall.

Miss Georgina Maundsley, who gained the Westmoreland Scholarship of the Royal Academy of Music at the last competition, is a pupil of Mr. Wallworth, another of whose pupils (Miss Aiwina Lohman) obtained the Westmoreland Scholarship at the Exhibition of April, 1868.

The Parisians are to be afforded the opportunity of appreciating Madame Arabella Goddard as a pianist this season. It is to be hoped she will make her début at the Conservatoire in one of Mendelssohn's concertos. It would be too much perhaps, to ask the French to try one by Sterndale Bennett.—The Queen, Dec. 25. (Unfortunately this is incorrect.)

Mr. John Boosey announces that the London Ballad Concerts will be resumed in St. James's Hall during the four Wednesdays in January, conducted by Mr. J. L. Hatton—chief singers: Mesdames Sherrington, Lichtert, Jewell, Patey, Elton, Messrs. Vernon Rigby and Patey, with Madame Arabella Goddard as pianist. The Orpheus Glee and Madrigal Union, directed by Mr. Fielding, will assist.

Herr Gottschalk's concerts have created a furore in Rio Janeiro. Tickets are sold eight days in advance, and speculators realise twenty-five dollars premium on seats. The Emperor, Imperial family, and Court attend at all his entertainments. A fantasia on the national hymn of Brasil composed by him and performed at his concerts, has highly pleased the Emperor and delighted the people. (Yankee puff.)

One day a poet read a new play before the reading committee of the French comedy. It was unanimously declined. The poet went up to M. Samson the well-known actor, and said to him: "I have a right to complain of you; you voted against my piece, and yet you slept all the time I was reading." M. Samson wittily replied: "Sir, in literary matters sleep is an opinion." Is not the rule as applicable to sermons as to plays?

In answer to the question, "How fast does sound travel?" Billings says he thinks it depends upon the sound you are talking about. "The sound of a dinner-horn, for instance, travels half a mile in a second, while an invitation to get up in the morning, I have known to be three quarters of an hour going up two pairs of stairs, and then not have strength enough left to be heard."

There was a funny scene at the Holliday Street Theatre in Baltimore on Saturday night. The operetta, A Rainy Day, was performing, and the mimic rain behind the scene was well managed. In the midst of it real rain began to descend through a ventilator in the dome, and sprinkled the occupants of the orchestra chairs and the musicians. Several umbrellas were raised among the audience, amid the most demonstrative cheers and laughter.

The first number of a musical paper in the Russian language has just appeared at St. Petersburgh. Its name translated, into English, is the Musical Season, from which it may be surmised that it will only be issued during that period of the year when operas and concerts are in vogue. We believe we are correct in stating that this is the first time a periodical exclusively devoted to music was ever published in Russia. Let us hope that the Musical Season of St. Petersburgh may turn out to be an independent advocate of the interests of art, and not what so many similar journals in Italy, France, Germany, and even England are—mere shop circulars.

A writer in the Salut Public of Lyons, just arrived from London, says that in a small theatre he witnessed the representation of a melodrama entitled Tropmann; or, The Human Tiger. All the details of the crime are faithfully produced. The audience is present at the assassination of the six victims. The comic business devolves on the gendarme, Ferrand. The pursuit of Tropmann recalls that which Victorien Sardou has dramatised in the Pommes du Voisin. The last act represents the court of assizes. Tropmann is on the bench of the accused. The jury is about to deliver the verdict. Suddenly a noise is heard, a door opens, and their appears—Kinck. senior. Tableau.

In response to a circular addressed to seventy choral organizations in Massachusetts, by Dr. Tourjée, having for its object the formation of a State Musical Society, a meeting was held at Boston Music Hall, November 17th. Resolutions were adopted styling the association the "Massachusetts Section of the National Musical Congress," and providing that its officers shall consist of an executive committee of seven, to be elected annually from the state choral societies. A resolution was also adopted recommending that all choral organizations throughout the country unite, without further delay, with the National Musical Congress, under the provisions of the constitution of that body, and pledging the efforts of the delegates present in that direction.

Attention, London!—A movement has been inaugurated in New York for a grand celebration of the centenary of Beethoven's birth. Several meetings have been held, and much interest is felt in the enterprise. At a meeting held at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, November 20th, William C. Bryant was chosen president of the association. Among the board of managers are Messrs. A. T. Stewart, S. B. Chittenden, Moses H. Grinnell, Horace Greely, George Wm. Curtis, &c. It was resolved that the festival should consist of a succession of musical observances for a number of days, and that application be made to the Central Park Commissioners, asking them to appropriate a site for a building for the festival, and to take charge and management of the same.

The peal of bells lately founded at Loughborough for Worcester Cathedral are deposited in the north transept preparatory to their elevation to the tower. They are 13 in number; 12 will ring in peal, and the 13th is the semi-tone required for the Westminster chimes. About 3,000*l.* has been raised by public subscription to defray their cost. They vary in weight from 6cwt. 3qrs. 19lb. to 50cwt. They are named after the Apostles, the great bell being St. Peter. Each is ornamented with a band of Gothic work, and the name of the Apostle inscribed on the waist, in letters of the 15th century. The total weight is 221cwt. 3qrs. 22lb. When the bells are hung it is proposed to have a dedication service to inaugurate the peal.

Reports just now about operatic engagements for the ensuing season must be received with caution. We may cite the instance of Mdlle. Marie Roze, who, according to several of our contemporaries, was secured by Mr. Wood for his Italian operatic company some time since; whereas, in fact, Mdlle. Roze is engaged in an engagement with M. Perrin, of the Académie Impériale. Another young pupil of M. Wartel's, however, Mdlle. Pauline Lewitsky, Russian by birth, of whom there has been no little talk recently in Paris, is, we are informed, pledged to Mr. Wood, and, if rumour may be believed, is likely to create a new sensation. M. Wartel has been singularly fortunate in his pupils, several of whom, among them Mdme. Trebelli-Bettini and Mdlle. Christine Nilsson, having obtained European reputation. It is to be hoped that Mdlle. Lewitsky may prove herself worthy such fellowship.

A contemporary might have found more materials for his notes on "Mendelssohn and Handel" if he had looked a little further into Mendelssohn's Letters and Devrient's Recollections. He has quoted the letter to Devrient of September 30, 1833, and the later undated one; but if he had looked into the Recollections under August 2, 1834, he would have found not only that Mendelssohn did at length receive the "Te Deum," but that it was performed (though not at a "winter concert"). "Oh," he says, "accept my thanks for sending the 'Te Deum' we shall do it on the 17th of August in the church, and the choruses already go quite charmingly." And this is corroborated by a sentence in another letter to Schubring of July 15:—

"This summer we have done in the church a mass of Beethoven's, one of Cherubini's, cantatas of Sebastian Bach's, an 'Ave Maria,' and 'Give to us peace' [by Mendelssohn himself], and next month we shall do Handel's Dettingen Te Deum. I need not say that they are by no means perfect; but one hears the things, and both performances and performers improve each time."

It thus seems to be certain that the "Te Deum," as performed at the oratorio concert of the 8th, was the fruit of Mendelssohn's ultimate corrections, his mature judgment of the manner in which "additional accompaniments" should be put to Handel.

"Parepa-Rosa" says an American paper "was singing 'Casta Diva' at San Francisco. Folding her white hands on her bosom, and raising her tender eyes, she commenced with her Æolian notes, the melody swelling and breaking into a gush of plaintive, supplicating harmony that vibrated through every chord of the heart. I glanced at my friend at my side, radiant in her dress and halo of golden hair, silver powdered, and there was a sweet pensive look on her downcast face. The music ceased, and the audience, wild with enthusiasm, were demanding encore, when my companion raised her large serene eyes to my face, and said, 'Isn't it sad?' 'Yes,' I replied, quickly, sharing her feeling, 'although so glorious, it touches a melancholy chord.' 'O, nonsense,' she exclaimed, 'I don't mean that! You know very well that I don't pretend to appreciate this kind of musical jargon. I mean isn't it sad to see so many young men in California bald-headed? I wonder if it isn't dissipation, or the climate, or what? Do you know I have been picking out bald heads down in the parquet, and, would you believe it, I actually counted out twenty-five!"

"One day as I was returning to Tallahassee from a hunting excursion in Florida," says a recent traveller (who writes for the Marines), "we were rowing along by the shore, about sunset, when suddenly a strange, grave, and prolonged sound struck my ear. At first I thought it must be a drone, or fly of extraordinary magnitude; but seeing nothing I questioned my guide as to what it could be. 'Oh, massa' replied he, 'dat is de fish what sings. Some call it siren, or mermaid fish, and others musico.' A little way on we heard a greater chorus of these strange voices, reminding me faintly of the music of church organs. I stopped the canoe, the better to study this strange phenomenon; when, at my request, my sable oarsman threw a net into the water, and soon laid at the bottom of the boat about a score of little fish each about two inches long, resembling the grey mullet very closely in outward form. 'Dese be mermaids, massa,' said the negro; 'but in the name of hebben, don't eat dem!' 'Why not?' quoth I. 'Because they hab the lub poison.' 'Lub poison?' and pray what's that?' 'Yes, massa; when you eat one ob dese fish, you fall so deep in lub you can never get out again.' I tried to laugh my black friend out of his notion, but in vain. In spite of what he said, however, I had my musico fried that evening, and found, as I expected, that it was none the worse for the experiment. The musician fish is white, with a few blue spots near the belly. It is about sunset when these fish begin to sing, and they continue their music during the night."

Herr von Dingelstedt, director of the Vienna Opera, is about to break through the traditions of ballet. He believes it to suffer from want of humour, and proposes to deal with the next new ballet facetiously. Amusing scenes are to awaken the public, and Herr Berg, a farce writer, has been charged with the task of providing a libretto full of absurd situations. It would be difficult to find anything more absurd than the ballets with which we are favoured, unless it is the situation of the spectators, who applaud the eccentricities of artists when, attempting to make themselves appear ridiculously graceful, they appear disgracefully ridiculous. Much might be done for this kind of entertainment by introducing the current topics of the day. The Southwark election, for instance. The corps would consist of electors. Mr. Layard, with castanets, would take his departure for Madrid. General dance, expressive of grief, by the corps. Pas seul by a "working man." Pas de deux by advanced Liberals, also calling themselves "working men." Pas seul by a Conservative. Pas de quatre by all the candidates. Dance, expressive of hesitation, by the corps. Music expressive of economy and retrenchment. Grand tableau—the House of Commons. Defiant dances by leaders of both parties. The majority pursue the minority round the stage. The successful candidate, as an independent member, trips to the footlights; music expressive of peace and progress. He dances round the stage pursued by whippers-in of both sides. The doors of the House fall down. Working men, licensed victuallers, local authorities, and habitual criminals join in a dance of a legislative description. Blue and orange lights flash and mingle, and the curtain falls to music expressive of the millenium.

COLOGNE.—Handel's oratorio of Solomon was performed at the eighth Gürzenich concert. The principal vocalist was Mdme. Joachim.

SALZBURG.—Herr Schachner's oratorio, Israel's Heimkehr aus Babylon, was produced at the Mozarteum a short time since, and it is to be repeated in a week or so.

ST. PETERSBURGH.—The programme of the second concert given by the Musical Society of Russia this season, contained Mozart's G minor Symphony; Beethoven's Violin Concerto, played by Herr Auer, professor at the Conservatory; the air, "Che farò senza Euridice?" from Gluck's Orfeo, Mdlle. Lawrowskaja being the vocalist; the "Festklange," by the Abbate Franz Liszt; a chorus from Handel's Samson; and Spohr's overture to Jessonda.

"'Effie's Bridal.' Ballad by Philomele.' This pleasing and effective ballad for a contralto voice is so perfectly well written that its fair composer need not have concealed her identity, and we should hope that the success of 'Effie's Bridal' will induce 'Philomele' to lift off the veil.

"Does anyone require a new Quadrille? Let him straightway become the purchaser of either of both the above, which are, without any exception, the most stylish, the most dashing, and the prettiest we know. We cannot choose between them; one is as good as another—another as good as one."—The Queen.

OFFENBACH'S SIX NEW SONGS, published this day with English words, price 3s. each. Extract from review in The Queen, October 23rd:—

"Mr. Kenney has skilfully and tastefully adapted original words to these truly characteristic songs, so that the lovers of Offenbach may sing any one of them in the first drawing-room in the land, without fear of offence to the most fastidious. We have said the music is characteristic, and that it is without doubt; but it is something more—it is both fresh and genial, and for light, unpretending music, we know of nothing prettier.

"No. 1. LOVE AND POETRY, is a graceful song for a mezzo-soprano in E flat, in a sentimental style.

"No. 2. SOME OTHER DAY, is a gay and sparkling bolero in A flat for soprano, F the highest note.

"No. 3. OUTWARD BOUND, is simple to a degree, but withal charming; melody and accompaniment alike being in good taste.

"No. 4. SEE YONDER BLOOMING ROSE another song of the sentimental order, is for soprano; highest note G, and very elegant.

"No. 5. GENTLY GLIDES OUR SKIFF, a barcarole in F, the gem of the series, and a delightful barcarole as we can call to mind. The song is perhaps best suited for a tenor; it is exceedingly vocal, and abounds in novel and piquant effects. If M. Offenbach had written nothing but this barcarole, we should still say that he is a very clever and original musician.

"No. 6. CUPID AND HYMEN, though less attractive than the other numbers is not without merit, and will possibly please many, more than would better music.

THE AMERICAN PRESS NOTICES CONTINUED,

ON THE PERFORMANCE OF

MISS ROSE HERSEE

AT

Philadelphia, Pittsburg, Chicago, &c.

"Arline (Miss Rose Hersee) created a profound sensation as her first notes broke upon the audience. Much had been expected from this prima donna, but few there were present, who imagined that she would prove the rival of any they had ever heard on the operatic boards. She held her hearers spell-bound, and won for herself the wildest applause ever awarded a soprano in this city. Jenny Lind had fire and enthusiasm, and few heard her who did not feel the power and brilliancy of her offerings; Kellogg imitated the Swedish nightingale with success—Piccolomini sings as earnestly and sweetly, Patti with more force and eloquence, Parepa with equal brilliancy and more art, but Rose Hersee has a school of her own; delicious and ecstatic to her hearers. Her advent among the stars who shine to illumine the fine arts of the nineteenth century marks an era, and none dispute her claims to the high place to which she is entitled.—Pittsburgh Daily Gazette, Oct. 21st, 1869.

"The most favourable accounts had been reported from the other cities of this charming songstress, yet but few could have anticipated such excellent vocal powers. The very first tones of her beautifully pure voice, at once strengthened the regard that her appearance suggested. The new débutante succeeded so admirably that nothing read be feared for her in the future. Her skill at once established her as a favourite, and this good opinion of her merits must grow with every occasion of hearing her. She was twice called before the curtain, and was, throughout the opera, favoured with the heartiest applause."—Chicago Republican, Oct. 27th, 1869.

"Her voice is a very pure soprano of clear, bird-like quality. She has remarkably brilliant executive powers, and some of her sustained tones (notably in her opening scene) were made as purely as their counterparts in the orchestra on the flute. One does not need the mouth of prophecy to augur that she will be a decided favourite in all her rôles."—Chicago Tribune, Oct. 27th, 1869.

"The second night of the season has come and gone, bringing with it the celebrated cantatrice, Miss Rose Hersee, who has created such a sensation in New York and Philadelphia. Well, the result is soon told—she came, she sang, she conquered. . . . . She was called before the curtain at the close of the second act, and again at the finale."—Chicago Evening Journal, Oct. 29th, 1869.

"Miss Hersee's début was a most emphatic success. Had she not sung quite as she did, the bright little Rose would still have had a good testimony of applause. But she won it doubly, for she sang charmingly. When we say that Miss Hersee is an artist fit to alternate with Mdme. Parepa-Rosa, and add that on this occasion she received several encores, and two calls before the curtain, we say a great deal, and in fact all that we have to say to-day."—The Evening Post, Oct. 27th, 1869.

"The Bohemian Girl was given last evening at the Operahouse to the largest audience of the season, an audience which literally filled every inch of standing room in the house. The prima donna of the evening was the charming little Hersee, who made her second appearance, and to whom the sight of such a vast audience must have been highly gratifying. It was a splendid compliment to the modest little singer. Her reception was very cordial, and during the progress of the opera cordiality developed into enthusiasm. She has established herself as a general favourite."—Chicago Tribune, Oct. 29th, 1869.

"Miss Hersee in the part of Arline confirmed the good opinion that was expressed of her Amina. Her voice has a wide range of expression, and is quite as effective in a simple ballad as it is in an aria that depends for its effect upon ornamentation."—Chicago Republican, Oct. 29th, 1869.

"Miss Rose Hersee, as Arline deepened the impression made by her Amina. Her sprightly acting, her twinkling eyes and laughing mouth, her style so perfectly natee and piquant, and above all, her clear and beautiful voice, carried the audience fairly by storm."—Chicago Evening Journal, Oct. 29th, 1869.

"On Tuesday night Miss Rose Hersee made her début here in Somnambula. This young lady is small in figure, a blonde with a profusion of golden hair, a pleasant, sparkling manner, a clear, pure voice, and very bird-like execution. She is young and pretty, and apparently unaffected. I regard it as a great hit to have engaged her in this troupe; her Amina was a lovely personation, not indeed betraying a life-long study of stage business, but by its freshness absolutely more delightful to the audience than a performance would have been that manifested a more prolonged acquaintance with the stage. In voice she was entirely equal to the demands of the music, leaving nothing to be desired! On Thursday night The Bohemian Girl was given, Miss Hersee as Arline. Miss Hersee made if possible, a more favourable impression than on Tuesday night."—Dwight's Journal of Music, Oct. 29th, 1869.

"Stopping a few days in Chicago. I find that the charming little prima donna, Rose Hersee made quite a sensation in the Somnambula. There was about 2800 dollars in the house, and the golden-haired little songstress captivated everybody by her delicious vocalisation and winning manner on the stage. She has a very brilliant career before her in this country. The entire press of the city were quite lavish in her praise."—New York Evening Telegram. (Correspondence.)

"La jeune artiste a interprété le chef-d'œuvre de Bellini avec un rare talent. Elle joint à une voix des plus séductrices une grâce d'exécution qui charme l'auditoire. Fantôtve maugre-t-elle, dans les situations pathétiques, de cette vérité qui se développe avec l'age, mais elle n'en est pas moins charmante et gentille à croquer. Elle a joué la scène de somnambulisme du seconde acte avec un fini que l'on trouve rarement sur les plus grandes scène d'Europe."—L'Amerique, Chicago, Oct. 29th, 1869.

"Her pretty voice and her charming singing lent some grace even to the hackneyed song which introduces Arline, and, as well in the choruses as in her solos, Miss Hersee may claim all the credit of the few encores that were given. Though her voice is exceedingly light, its quality is so pure, and her method and articulation so accurate that it is heard, in all its sweet and sympathetic quality, throughout the house, and everybody is perfectly willing to be fascinated with it and the possessor."—Chicago Times, Oct. 29th, 1869.

"Mozart Hall.—The Marriage of Figaro was performed last night for the first time in Cincinnati before the largest audience that ever assembled on a similar occasion in the city. A song by Miss Hersee, 'Dove Sono,' with which the second act begins, obtained the first hearty applause of the evening The rendering was more tender, the tones were more sympathetic, the expression was more touching than in any of Miss Hersee's former efforts, and the encore was deservedly won." —Cincinnati Gazette, Nov. 20th, 1869.

SOMETHING ABOUT FRANZ SCHUBERT.*

I.

"Quand on est mort, c'est pour longtemps"—said Désaugiers. We lost poor Schubert on the 19th November, 1828—it was nearly forty years afterwards, in October, 1868, that the ceremony of laying the first stone of the Schubert Monument took place in the Stadtpark. I was present on the occasion with two other old friends of him who had gone so long ago, Franz von Schober, and Franz Lachner. Unfortunately, Moritz von Schwind of Munich, Schubert's favourite in the fresh days of youth, was unable to attend. It was but natural that we who did attend should indulge in reminiscences of the years we had all spent together.

I will here endeavour to describe a few events from the period in question, in so far as they refer to our common friend. Schubert was brought up in the Convict,† but resided afterwards with his father (a schoolmaster in the Rossau), whom he assisted in the capacity of usher. That this pedagogical occupation did not especially please the young genius is a fact which is very easy of comprehension. However, in the midst of sorrows and anxieties of all sorts, Schubert kept composing away, unknown and nameless, his talent being appreciated only by a few friends.

Franz von Schober, a clever young fellow, only a year or two older than Schubert, received him free of expense in the home he shared with his mother. Delivered from the burdensome yoke of the school, the young artist breathed freely, and gave himself passionately up to incessant composition, feeling irresistibly impelled to do so, because, after being snatched from his wretched position, he had suddenly plunged into what to him was a new world, and, also, found a large circle of friends, among whom were Mayerhofer, the poet; Kupelwieser, the painter; the philosophical Bruchmann, and others. It was there, too, that he first became acquainted with the celebrated dramatic singer, Michael Vogl. The representative of Orestes, of the Patriarch Jacob, of Talasco, of Count Almaviva, &c., equally at home in literature and art, a singer possessing a perfect musical education, and then in the zenith of his fame, soon perceived what a rich spring of music flowed from the young man's earliest songs and ballads. It was Vogl, too, who first introduced poor Franz to the Viennese public.

The "Erlkönig," sung by Vogl in the Kärntnerthor-Theater, and accompanied by Schubert on the piano, produced a great sensation and soon made the round of the world. The ice was now broken, and the hard hearts, also, of the publishers began to thaw a little, though those gentlemen still obstinately persisted in not opening their purses very wide to the newly discovered genius who was to be duly worked out for their benefit.

For some time, Schubert led a hard life, giving pianoforte lessons, and composing whatever was offered him, even sacred things. Very acceptable, therefore, was the proposal made him in the summer of 1818, by Count Johann Esterhazy, to go and spend a month or two on his estate of Zelcz, in Hungary, giving in return the young Countesses a few pianoforte lessons. How pleased and delighted he felt there is shown by a letter addressed, under cover to Schober, to his friends in Vienna:—

"Zelcz, 3rd August, 1818.

"My best and dearest Friends,—How could I forget you, you who are everything to me! Spaun, Schober, Mayerhofer, Senn, how are you; well? I myself am well. I live and compose like a God, as though I must do so. Mayerhofer's 'Einsamkeit' is finished, and, I think, it is the best thing I have done, for I was free from care. I hope you are quite well and happy, as I am. At present, I really live, thank God; it was high time, for otherwise I should have been a musician spoilt. Get Schober to give my respects to Herr Vogl; I shall soon take the liberty of writing to him also. If it is possible, I shall ask if he will not be kind enough to sing a song by me, whichever one he chooses, at the Runzisches Concert in November. Greet all and every of my acquaintances. Write to me very soon; every single letter of the alphabet from you is dear to me. Your ever true friend, FRANZ SCHUBERT."

A long letter to his friends generally, of the 18th September, 1818, describes, partly in a jocose manner, his mode of life in the castle at Zelcz:—

"I was just attending an ox and cow licitation," he writes, "when your much prized letter was handed to me. I read it with incessant laughter and childish delight. It seemed as though I was holding my dear friends themselves in my hands."

Further on in the epistle he says:—

"That the opera people in Vienna are so stupid at present as to produce the finest operas without me," is a fact that sends me into a small rage. In Zelcz I must be my own everything: composer, editor, audience, and I know not what besides. For what is true art not a soul here has any feeling, or, at most, now and then (if I am not mistaken) only the Countess. I am therefore alone with my Beloved whom I am obliged to hide in my room, in my piano, in my breast. Though this frequently renders me melancholy, it raises me, on the other hand, all the more.——During this period, I have produced several songs, and I think they are great successes."

Of the celebrated Milder he speaks very shortly but very happily; "He sings most beautifully and shakes most badly." Speaking of the inmates of the castle, he says:—

"The cook, tolerably rakish; the ladysmaid, thirty years old; the housemaid very pretty, frequently my companion; the nurse, a good old soul; the steward, my rival. The two equerries are much better towards horses than towards human beings. The Count, somewhat rough; the Countess proud, but of gentler mind; the young Countesses, good girls. That I with my natural sincerity, get on extremely well with all these people is a fact which I need scarcely tell you, who know me." The epistle concludes thus:—"And now, my dear fellows, fare ye well, all, and write to me very soon. My dearest and most valued source of amusement is to read your letters ten times over. Greet my beloved parents, and tell them I yearn for a letter from them.—With eternal love, your true friend, FRANZ SCHUBERT."

Appended are two letters of the years 1823 and 1824, to Schober,

ANTWERP.— Auber's Premier Jour de Bonheur has been produced here with great success.

SCHWERIN.—Herr Wilhelm Claussen, the first holder of the Meyerbeer Exhibition, and a composer of very great promise, died here, in this his native town, on the 22nd December, in his twenty-sixth year.

FLORENCE.—Signor Petrella's Giovanni di Napoli was produced with great success on the opening night of the season at the Pergola. There is a report that Signor Edvardo Vera's opera, Valeria, will shortly be brought out at this theatre.

MUSIC AT HOME.—The man who comes here for musical enjoyment may find himself sometimes disappointed. The season of Advent has commenced. I can only tell German readers, who probably derive their ideas concerning these musicians of nature from the familiar "Pastoral" in Handel's Messiah, that, on hearing the first few notes, I experienced a deep sense of shame at the infatuation which caused me to laugh at the edict of the wise syndic of Mireval, in which that worthy individual defined instrumental music as "a standing invitation to disorder, and a constant cause for mutual hatred among fellow citizens." It is here that, from these wretched notes, Handel distilled one of his freshest instrumental pieces, but I know better than all his biographers where he laid the foundation for the ruin of his nervous system, a calamity for which he first found a remedy in the health-giving springs of Aix-la-Chapelle. This precious music has now begun for the last week punctually at five o'clock in the morning, before the image of the Madonna under my window. First there is the bagpipe with its sustained chords, and then suddenly commencing on the sixth, the fearful zampogna, with a tone resembling the shriek of a tortured ape, hurrying down, with certain quick cross figures, to the tonic; stopping there for awhile, and then beginning the horrible process from the commencement again. A man must possess a strong constitution, in order, when subjected to such continuous torture, not to have his brain filled with melancholy notions or fixed ideas—for instance, that on an appointed day all the peripatetic disciples of art intended meeting before the image of the Virgin for the purpose of giving a monster concert. If ever they do so, I shall beg your permission to go into the country for a few days.—Correspondent of the "Kölnische Zeitung."

OPERA BOUFFE FORTY YEARS AGO.

Forty years ago, a Cincinnatian, named Curtis, conceived the idea of a novel and grand concert, with which he hoped to find favour with the Ohio River boatmen. Living near "Western Row," where cats abounded, Curtis did not lack the opportunities to study the musical capacity of the feline race. They had kept him awake many a warm moonlight night, when he preferred sleep to their infernal serenades. So he determined to get up a grand Philharmonic concert, in which cats should take a prominent part. Taking a few cats to experiment on, he tried various modes of bringing out the notes they were addicted to, or excelled in. He pinched their ears, stuck pins in their rotundities, and used other unpleasant devices to develop the music. But he found no way so certain to bring out the sound as the application of the back of a case-knife across the tail. This never failed to elicit the note, if there was any talent at all in the animal—the modulations, piano and forte, being easily obtained by making the blow light or heavy.

Curtis employed an Englishman named Johnson, a drinking man, but musical withal, who could build organs, or make one to serve as an accompaniment to the cat voices. Johnson informed him that one of six octaves would do at least for the experiment. Curtis reckoned up the octaves, and found that four dozen cats would fill the bill. But he ordered two dozen more for fear that some might have defective voices, or prove obstinate and capricious, like the operatic tribe generally. Six dozen, then were ordered, and accommodations were prepared for them in sundry boxes, barrels, kegs, &c., in the back yard. Johnson went on with the building of the organ, and the adaptation of the cats' heads keys to the cats' tails. He arranged that the singers should be confined in narrow boxes, which, while they allowed free play to the lungs, guarded against clawing by having four holes in the bottom through which the legs protruded. The tails were enclosed in tubes provided with longitudinal slots, across which the black keys worked. These extra keys were connected somehow with those of the organ, so that the keys and the appropriate voices should be in perfect unison, and thus produce the expected concord of sweet sounds.

Curtis, on his part, proceeded with the musical education of the cats, aided occasionally by Johnson, and in a month or so had a complete choir, from the kitten of two months, his trebles and falsettos, and his pussy sopranos, up to the venerable toms who growled out double bass equal to Carl Formes. But at length the organ was completed, and the six octaves of cats arranged in due order. A few rehearsals were given. The second story of a warehouse near the landing was rented; a stage drop-scene and tiers of seats provided—the whole intended to accommodate four or five hundred people. The organ and cats were safely transported to the place of exhibition or performance without accident, save that the two principal basses, being accidentally put in the same box, had an awful fight all the way up from Western Row, and were obliged to appear before the public with very rueful faces and bloody noses, which, however, did not detract from their popularity. Every thing being in readiness, Curtis had flaming posters stuck up, all about the levee, displaying in huge letters:—

CURTIS'S CAT HARMONICON!

GRAND VOCAL AND INSTRUMENTAL CONCERT!

Forty-Eight Cats!

&c., &c., &c.

The house was crowded at an early hour by the jolly boatmen, the spaces not big enough for men being filled, as usual, by boys. After the usual delay, the curtain rose, and the grand Cat Harmonicon was disclosed to view; two rows of cat heads, two dozen each, glared with their lustrous green and yellow eyes straight at the audience. Little ruffles were around their necks; miniature music stands, with books and candles, were placed before them; the aforesaid two basses, whose beauty was spoiled by the fight, being provided with muslin bands, which added to the gravity of their countenances. The whole was indescribably comic, and received with due applause. Seated at the organ was Johnson, in a clean shirt, and as sober as he could afford to be on so grand an occasion. As soon as he could be heard, Curtis advanced and stated to the audience that the first song of the evening would be "Auld Lang Syne" (or, as he pronounced it, "Old Lang Zion"), which would be followed by "Hail Columbia," "Clar de Kitchen," and other patriotic and devotional songs. Johnson squared himself for the task, ran his fingers tenderly over the keys by way of prelude, and then dashed boldly and vigorously into "Old Lang Zion," producing such a burst of music as was never heard on this continent before, nor ever will again until another Curtis arises to carry into more successful execution his brilliant experiment. The cats were excited to fury by the new uproarious audience, and still more under the unusually severe pounding of their tails. They forgot all their lessons they had been taught, they paid no attention to either tune or tune, rhyme or reason, but squalled and mewed, and yelled, and spit, and phizzed in the madness of pain and terror, drowning the sound of the organ, which could occasionally be heard droning out its "Old Lang Zion" in the rear of the unearthly tornado of caterwauling. Never was an audience so completely enchanted — never was delight so universal, so unbounded, and so vigorously expressed. Shouts, roars, yells of laughter, such as Western men alone can give, burst from the crowd, shaking the building from roof to foundation. Curtis was delighted, the cats were furious, Johnson was beside himself with joy, and hammered away at the keys with all his strength, making, with the aid of the choir and the plaudits of the audience, a "concord" of diabolical sounds never before heard this side the infernal regions. Unfortunately, in his delirium, he forgot the strength or weakness of the bellows which supplied the organ with wind, and which he worked with his feet. He had not reached the end of the song when the bellows gave way and brought the performance to a sudden close, the cats alone continuing the song or noise till one after another they became silent, and stood winking and blinking at the spectators, in mute fear of a recommencement of the torture. The audience got up furious yells, stamping with all their might. In the midst of it the platform came down with the audience, and then there was laughter, swearing, and blows, and the boys began to pelt the cats with sticks. Curtis fearing for the safety of his pets, and unable to remove them bodily from the scene of danger, lifted off the upper planks, which confined their necks in their places, and set them at liberty. The terror-stricken creatures darted away in every direction, mostly among the feet of the spectators, adding to the confusion. Whoops, yells, hurrahs, and shouts were followed by a general smash-up of windows. The boys, running down the stairs raised the cry of "Fire!" Citizens and watchmen crowded the streets to learn the cause of the uproar, and the engines had great difficulty in getting near enough to perform their part of the work. There was no sign of fire, not even of smoke; but the old "Liberty No. 2" could not afford to come all the way down there for nothing; so she poured a deluge of fresh water through the front window, drenching the whole crowd inside to the skin in half a minute. Peace was instantly restored, and the late belligerents came rushing and trembling pell-mell down the stairs.

Thus ended Curtis's grand Cat Concert, an event that was talked of and laughed over for many years by the jolly Boaters of the Ohio. The projector was ordered to appear before the mayor next morning, and explain the cause of the riot, and was let off with the admonition to do so no more—and he didn't.

POETRY.

(Communicated.)

Messrs. Virtue & Co. have just issued a volume of poems by Reginald Robert Cooke, B.A., entitled Purpose and Passion, being Expiation and other poems, about which we extract the following from the Norfolk News:—

"We have now said all that we feel called upon to say in the matter of fault-finding with this work. There is abundance to commend. It is full of high and noble thought expressed in high and noble verse. There are some thoughts respecting the Divine Being, from 'A Reveal at Night,' which may be placed beside anything that has ever been written on the subject.

> 'Thus look on God—God that with artist hand
> Works out his poem-pictures of the world,
> Globed into one huge drama, without pause
> Between the acts; setting men's hearts to work
> Through plots and climaxes and counterplots;
> Their souls his vivid hues, made fair about
> By resting-places of fresh vales and hills,
> And forest canopies of incent leaves.'

> 'Shepherd of worlds that give the myriads food,
> Maker and builder up of all the stars,
> Lord of the hanging fires of the heavens,
> Centred within mid souls, and love, and life,
> By speechless twilights that reveal no end—
> The name of Father is not great enough,
> The name of Mother is not sweet enough,
> To give Him praise.'

"But, as we regard it, incomparably the finest poem in the volume is 'Ex Astro.' It is a magnificent discourse on the great mysteries that have ever had a fascination for enquiring minds. Among the other poems, the well-known story of 'Esau and the Ring' has been given in a fine dramatic sketch. The classical subjects are handled with the facility of a scholar, and are resplendent with the colours thrown around them by a warm imagination. We believe we have not heard the last of Mr. Cooke. We are greatly mistaken if he does not make his mark upon the literature of his age, and we look with much interest for the produce of his second harvest."

—o—

VENICE.—Signor Mallpiero, the composer, is again the manager of the Fenice for the season of Carnival and Lent. The prospectus promises Crispino, Lucia, Il Barbiere, Marino Faliero, and Le Figlie del Reggimento. Besides these operas, there will be three novelties; Signor Petrella's opera, I promessi Sposi; M. David's Ercolano; and L'Orio Soranzo, by Ruix.

THE INTELLIGENT UNDERSTANDING OF MUSIC.

(From the "Choir and Musical Record.")

The majority of the music performed in our concert-rooms and not unfrequently in the home circle, might, we fear, be aptly described as "that which all hear but few understand." When we say this we are far from saying that it falls on an inattentive or unappreciative audience, but we simply assert what must be patent to all who exercise the most ordinary power of observation, that an intelligent understanding of the great mass of the symphonies, sonatas, or even of the minor pieces we so constantly hear, is the exception and not the rule. That this should be the case is not surprising. Although musical education, so-called, forms a part of the normal schools at our ladies' schools; although choral societies and church choirs are at work all over the kingdom; although concerts form the most popular entertainments, even in the village school,—still these all tend chiefly to familiarize those who assist at them with musical sounds, and fail to impart any substantial aid towards the mental effort which must be made before those same sounds can be connected in the hearer's mind with anything more than a mere pleasurable sensation, which it is one, but one only of their true ends to produce. In the case of other sciences some attempt is usually made by the professor to impart instruction as well as amusement in the exercise of his art. The Owens and the Tyndalls of our day do not content themselves with demonstrations and experiments calculated only to attract and astonish the eye or the ear. The lecturer on chemistry does not consider his work is done when he has produced brilliant combinations of colour. The electrician is not satisfied with mystifying a crowd of eager listeners with effects, of which the causes are beyond their ken. In all these cases, the popular exposition of the science is made the medium of conveying an explanation of its deep principles, which would not only be unintelligible but unpalatable to the ordinary and too often uneducated mind if placed nakedly before it. But when music is the subject treated, a totally opposite course is adopted. As a rule it is left to speak for itself. Symphony follows overture and song follows sonata night after night, season after season, and it is not too much to say that a very large number of the audience rise from their seats without even realizing the meaning of the varied forms in which the compositions are cast, much less the intention of the writers or the extent to which they have carried them out. The analytical programmes provided by the director of the Monday Popular Concerts for the use of his friends, and by the old and new Philharmonic and other societies have been stimulated to supply, are, it is true, steps in the right direction, but even these are couched in language which is unhappily still a dead letter to the great body of amateurs, and thus they scarcely meet the want to which we are alluding. That it is a want of the age, is, we think, undeniable, and therefore it is worthy of consideration, whether, with the means already at our command, we cannot do something towards applying it.

To this question a practical answer has been afforded during the past few weeks by the Musical Professor at Edinburgh University, whose efforts to promote the education of the amateurs of the art in the northern capital are forming so worthy a fulfilment of the objects which the founder of the Chair of Music had in view. Professor Oakeley has, as our readers have learnt from the frequent records we have published of his performances, given during the University sessions a series of organ recitals to which he has invited the citizens as well as the students, thus making the class-room in Park Place just what it should be—a centre of musical life for the whole city, as the University itself is the centre in every branch of learning for the country. In the programmes he has never failed to give an educational bearing to the recitals, and in selection and arrangement his scheme has hitherto been highly satisfactory, but to these advantages he has now added another at the opening of the present season by prefacing each piece with a few remarks either historical or descriptive, thus furnishing that very aid to an intelligent understanding of the music to the general absence of which we have alluded. Thus what in ordinary cases would be a mere organ concert has become a means of direct musical training, calculated not only to create a desire to search further into the deep things of the art, but to impart a totally fresh interest to the music played. Here, then, in a rough form, is the remedy for the evil to which we have called attention, a means ready to hand of raising music from the unworthy place to which it has been too habitually lowered, and of imparting to our concert-rooms a higher element than is now often to be found in them. On many occasions perhaps a running commentary on a performance would be out of place, but at such recitals as those of Madame Arabella Goddard and Mr. Charles Hallé, which are ostensibly designed to elevate the taste and to afford intellectual entertainment to those who are anxious to be taught, we believe the system would be found to work most admirably. Indeed we question whether it might not with equal fitness be applied to all classical performances; and whether with a capable speaker, the introductory remarks would soon be regarded as an integral part of the evening's entertainment. The days have, we would fain hope, for ever passed away when music was regarded merely as the pastime of an idle hour, and we believe that some such assistance to intelligent progress would be gladly welcomed. It is impossible to watch an audience at a Monday Popular Concert without feeling that the brain as well as the mere sentimental enthusiasm of a large body of the almost breathless listeners is being called into exercise; and we are therefore ascribing to them nothing more than they deserve when we assert that they would rejoice to rise still higher in the world of art opened out before them by the touch of a Goddard, or the love of a Joachim.

At any rate, whether the adoption of such a system in ordinary concerts would be wise or not, of one thing there can be little doubt, that the establishment of a series of concerts in which explanatory remarks would form a component part of the scheme is highly desirable. If the music-room at Edinburgh is crowded, it cannot be doubted that an equally eager band of amateurs would be found in London and in other large towns in the kingdom; and it would indeed be casting a slur upon the profession to argue that its foremost members are unable thus to argue that its foremost members are unable thus to set forth in intelligible language the meaning of the tone-poems to which their artistic skill impart life and reality. Say more, if in every district some such course were adopted, and if instead of the chief interest of a concert being centred on the special excellencies of the "star," the beauties of the music and the design of its composer were set forth with clearness and brevity, we can but think that the interests of art would be promoted, and that a powerful means would be provided of making the English la reality as well as in name a music loving people.

A new musical association, the "Société Soleildieu," has been founded at Rouen. It proposes to give periodical concerts with orchestra and chorus.

The Messe Solennelle has just been performed in Moscow, under the direction of Herr Nicholas Rubinstein. The Sisters Marchisio and Signor Stagno took part.

Don Pasquale is to be produced at the Lyrique for the début of a new singer, Mdlle. Cerny. Much has been said, in advance, about Mdlle. Cerny's talent.

Another German musical paper has just ceased to exist: the Süddeutsche Musikzeitung of Mayence. Our late contemporary died at the age of eighteen.

Milan.—The Teatro della Scala was opened on the 26th ult., with Prince Poniatowski's opera, Pierre de Medici, and the ballet of Don Parasol. The performance went off, on the whole, rather coldly. The opera was tolerably well received, and would have been received still better, there can be no doubt, but for the execution, which was far from satisfactory. Madame Sass, however, came up to the expectations formed of her. Signor Medini, the bass, was also applauded, but not so Signor Zaccometti, the tenor, whose vocal ability is not of a kind suited to a first-class theatre. Signor Storti, baritone, and Signor Corsi, tenor, are nothing very great. The composer, Prince Peniatowski, was called on several times. The ballet was a failure.

Moscow.—The Italian operatic season is going on swimmingly. Madame Artôt-Padilla and the Sisters Marchisio are very great favourites. So is, also, the conductor, M. Dupont. Among the operas already produced are Saffo, Semiramide, La Cenerentola, Il Barbiere, Fra Diavolo, Roberto, Guillaume Tell, Faust, and La Figlia.—The Russian Musical Society lately gave their first concert. The programme included Mendelssohn's music to A Midsummer Night's Dream; Beethoven's Fourth Symphony; fragments from Schumann's Manfred; and Herr R. Wagner's overture to Tannhäuser. The society have, also, announced that they intend giving very shortly a performance of Rossini's Messe Solennelle, with Mdme. Artôt-Padilla, the Sisters Marchisio, Signori Stagno and Rota.

Ratisbon Embarrassing.—A short time ago, in a provincial town in France, the bills announced the production of a piece which had been performed with great success in Paris. Suddenly, however, the leading actor was taken ill. What was to be done? In the company there was another actor who never appeared without exciting a storm of hisses. The manager entrusted him to undertake the character that was to have been sustained by the actor who had been taken ill. After refusing a long time, the poor devil consented. What did it matter to him whether he was hissed off the stage in one piece or not? The evening of the first performance at length arrived. When the unpopular actor made his appearance, there was a volley of hisses. The audience, however, listened to him. Soon afterwards a murmur of approbation went round the house; then there were some isolated bravos; and, lastly, when the curtain fell, tumultuous applause and a call! The actor appeared, looking very pale and alarmed. "Ladies and gentlemen," he said, "being convinced that I should have the misfortune to displease you, I thought that you would not allow me to play further than the end of the first act at the very most—so it is the only act I learned; I do not know a word of the two others."

THE BURIAL OF MOZART AT VIENNA ON THE 7TH (6TH) DECEMBER, 1791.*

(From Information furnished by Mozart's Wife and by my Foster-Father.)

After receiving Intelligence of Mozart's death, Count Dehm, known under the name of Müller (and proprietor of the Cabinet of Art near the Rother Thurm), called in the forenoon of the 7th (6th) December, and took a plaster-of-Paris cast from the face of the great Deceased.

Gottfried, Baron van Swieten, the worthy son of the celebrated Gerhard van Swieten, and then Prefect of the Court Library, like his father, also visited the house of mourning, and offered to do everything he could, either by words or deeds. Emmanuel Schikaneder was apparently inconsolable. He had managed to turn Mozart's musical powers to such good account as to build himself the largest theatre in Vienna. But it never entered the head of him or of any one else to erect a simple tombstone with the name of Mozart upon it, in memory of the illustrious man they had lost, though, in the year 1791, the expense of such a stone would not have been more than two florins. Such was the ungrateful, pitiful manner in which Vienna then behaved with regard to the corpse of a man whom Europe calls its greatest composer. It was not till sixty-four years after his death that a memorial was raised to him. Eight florins, thirty-six kreutzers were paid for the funeral service, and three florins for the hearse. This is now the price of a box in the new Operahouse, when his Don Juan is performed.

In the death-register of St. Marx, we read: "The 6th December, 1791, died Herr Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, Imperial Chapelmaster, and Chamber-Composer, at No. 970, Rauhensteingasse, of violent purple fever; visited; 36 years old. In the cemetery of St. Marx, 1st class: 8 florins, 36 kreutzers paid to the parish of St. Stefan; hearse, 3 florins."

Furthermore, Mozart appears in the Vienna Diarium of 1791, No. 99, at page 3162, containing the lists of deaths. We there find: "The 5 December in the city: Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, Imperial Chapelmaster and Chamber-Composer, 36 years old, at No. 970, Rauhensteingasse."

For a long time, complete obscurity veiled the spot where Mozart had been, without more ado, plunked into the earth. It was not till sixty-three years had elapsed that his last resting-place was discovered, in the following strange fashion:—

On the same day that Mozart died, there died in the Weihburggasse, Michael Kneil, Verunker, and, in the Wollzeile, a milkwife; these two persons were buried a few hours sooner than Mozart, who was deposited in the same grave as they were, he being on the top of them. Katharina Harruschka, and her son, Franz, assistant grave-digger, were still in the cemetery, when Mozart's corpse arrived late in the evening. Katharina Harruschka, called Frau Kathi, the licensed beggar of the cemetery, asked the driver of the hearse whether any carriages with mourners were coming. The driver replied in the negative. Frau Kathi then asked: "What, no mourners, then?" "A chapelmaster," was the answer. "What, a musician?" said Frau Kathi. "They are poor people; I shall not wait to get anything more to-night; perhaps some one may come out to-morrow." The driver laughed and said: "I, too, have been done; not a kreutzer to get a drop of something to drink."

These three persons were well acquainted with the spot where Mozart lay, and frequently spoke about it at home. Katharina Harruschka lived till she was 84, and her son, Franz, also attained a great age. It was by the instrumentality of these persons, that F. Gloggl, music publisher, Vienna, was enabled to appear, one day, before the Burgomaster, Dr. von Seiler, with a memorial in which he asserted that he could point out exactly Mozart's resting place, and, at the same time, as most of his assertions rested upon oral communications, begged that the correctness of the same might be corroborated by official investigation, since he felt convinced that it would only be gratifying a universal wish to rectify the previous defective and erroneous statements respecting the resting-place of the great composer.

The result of the official enquiry was, considering the circumstances, favourable. Three of the witnesses examined, who had come to the knowledge of the fact at issue in perfectly independent and different manners, pointed out unanimously, and in conformity with their profoundest convictions, the parallelogram which looks towards the old entrance of the St. Marx Cemetery, on the right of the principal path in the fifth row of graves, and planted with a clump of willows, as the spot where Mozart's body was buried, on the 7th (6th) December, 1791.

When the spot had been thus certified by the above unanimous depositions, the Burgomaster considered that it would be simply an act of pious reverence to raise to the memory of the great composer a monument worthy of him, and to have a medal struck off in his honour.

The Common Council of Vienna voted the money for the erection of the monument, which was uncovered on the 5th December, 1856 (1859).

INSIDE ST. PETER'S.

(By a "Special.")

I heard the silver trumpets, as I have heard before, and saw the Pope carried in his chair of state, as I have seen before, but to much more advantage and with grander associations. On the opening day the Pope descended from his chair immediately on entering the church, so that he and the Fathers without their mitres were lost among the bayonets and shakoes. But on this day, after long waiting, and after the Fathers were nearly all seated, distant music was heard, a movement, and then a silence passed over the multitude. The clergy, the ladies, and the Zouaves not on duty were looking about to see how they could kneel, and I looked down the nave to the great bronze doors few people see moved on their hinges more than once or twice in their life. Already a strange apparition was suspended in mid-air, high over the heads of the people and standing out clear in the comparative gloom of the tower nave. It was the group made by the chair, the canopy, and the fans, and as it advanced it widened, till it seemed to stretch from pier to pier. The chair is a tall throne, the footstool of which stands a yard over the heads of the people. The canopy must be about 15ft. high, and 20ft. long—itself a light fluttering, but showy thing; and the fans are arranged to look like wings to the central mass. The whole is white and silver, excepting just the back of the throne. The appearance floated awards as a bright cloud—a water spirit, perhaps, formed of mists and vapours rather than the rapid messenger of some heavenly behest. Still the effect was most unearthly—" uncanny" I had caught myself saying, but overpowering on the nature we are made of. The canopy at times looked like the fringes of a cloud, and as it moved the whole looked undefined and incorporeal. It approached, it hung over the crowd collected round the tomb of St. Peter. Had I wished to kneel I could not, nor could any about me, and I had also to use my eyes. The Pope was occupied as he always is on such occasions, and it is one of those mysteries of his singular state which one would not wish to probe. He was looking about for some features in which he could trace, by a special instinct, the faith, the affection, and the dutifulness that might merit and justify a blessing, which therefore he bestowed with fixed look and with the usual movement of the hand. It was the act of one sifting the crowd. Of course, it is not easy to conceive a process so simple, so brief, and with the successful results so entirely a matter of faith, being repeated continually, now for a quarter of a century, with the same intentness and fervour; but that is not our affair. This the Pope was seen to be now doing, as he was borne round the marble balustrade and the high altar to his throne, now placed for the occasion on the south side of the choir. His bearers had to wheel round for this, but they did it well. He was soon on his throne, and the service began. No doubt this was all as usual, but I could see little of it. It was in the midst of 700 tall mitres, besides functionaries, Swiss Guards, soldiers, and Royal and diplomatic personages in raised tribunes. The high altar stands above all this, as much as five feet above the floor; on the act of celebration one could see, as, indeed, almost all could. All good Catholics know to a moment of time, by some sort of secret calculation, when the miracle is to be done. A quarter of a minute earlier "Attention!" had been shouted down the nave; then all a word some 500 muskets were grounded, then a silence of prayer and expectation, and then those wondrous sounds which all must feel and remember. The trumpet notes rise and fall, and roll round the dome, and linger in the air, and hardly die away. Again they sound, and again, as if echoes of themselves. Beautiful indeed they are, and whoever has heard will wish that he may hear them again; but they are more sweet than solemn, more mysterious than awful. They are an incantation. It is not a word one likes to use, nor can it be high said that the ancient music of the Church has this character; but though the sweetest, most soothing, and most delightful of incantations, that, I confess, seemed to me what I heard. But rolling far above, it filled all the church, entered every ear, and must have thrilled through every soul. Common strains were feeble after this, and it was not very long before the blessing was pronounced, the white mitres began to strain off like a glacier down the nave, the Pope was again in his tottering throne, and no doubt very glad to escape into the side separated for the use of the Council, and thence to the palace behind. For the comfort, the beauty of the spectacle, and for the opportunity of seeing the Fathers, the opening day was nothing to this.

AN AMERICAN ON MUSIC IN PARIS.

The following extract from a private letter has been published in Dwight's Journal of Music. It will be read with interest:—

"Went yesterday afternoon to the Cirque Napoleon to hear Pasdeloup's orchestra. They play almost to perfection; a little feeble in the clarionet and oboe, and decidedly so in the horns, but as nearly perfect as need be in other respects. We had a Suite by a certain Marmontel, which was interesting and stupid by turns. Rather inclined to be queer than beautiful. The last movement (alla marcia) was especially full of unexpected freaks of instrumentation. The public seemed to like it though. Next came an adagio from one of Mozart's symphonies. Beautifully played and enthusiastically received. Then came my favourite of favourites that I never expected to hear out of Boston—Schumann's Genoveva overture. If the Leonora No. 3 is the king, this is certainly the princess of overtures. Pasdeloup took the allegro a trifle fast for my taste, and the horns were almost inaudible in the little passage in triplets that keeps recurring throughout the movement; but the orchestra played con amore, and the public was rapturous. Then we had Beethoven's Symphony in C major, played to absolute perfection and cheered after every movement. The andante was encored, and the scherzo and trio had to be repeated. I never saw so intelligently attentive an audience. In the trio of the scherzo the whole house laughed, as they would at a Warren farce, as that little crescendo run on the violins led back to the regular beat on the reed instruments. It is something when an audience knows when a joke is meant.

"The concert finished with the Tannhäuser overture. Not so perfectly played as it might have been. The passage where the clarionet comes in with Venus's enticing theme was fearfully flat. At the end the audience rose like one man and cheered like mad, and it took all Pasdeloup's generalship in getting the orchestra off the stage to prevent the whole overture from being bissée.

"And now I will tell you a true story. When I first went to the opera here, I was struck with the thinness and weakness of the trombones as soon as I heard them. During the entr'acte I noticed that they were the Saxtrombones with cylinders and pistons. I noticed the same weakness in all the operas, but I thought it might be prejudice on my part. Yesterday at the concert I was so placed that I could only see the violins and a few 'celli. When the trombones came in in the Masonnet Suite, where, by the way, they have a good deal to do, I said to myself I must for once own up to the Saxtrombones. I never heard such splendid tones in my life. Before the next movement the two men who had been standing up in front of me went away, and I saw three trombones up in the orchestra, all on the old slide pattern. The horns and even the trumpets (!) were without valves in all the classical pieces. It is a significant thing that in the finale, the best quartette of the instruments, they should be the first to go back to the old horns and trumpets. Nevertheless, I admit that, when horns and trombones are so clumsily written for as in the Italian scores, the valve instruments are preferable.

"In the evening I went to the Concert de l'Opera. Orchestra of about a hundred and chorus of ninety—Litolff conducting. They played a little better than our H. M. A., but not very well. In the slow movements they leave our orchestra very far behind, but in the allegros they don't seem quite at home. The concert began with the Freischütz overture. The opening movement was beautifully played—the allegro regularly butchered. The Hector Berlioz pieces that followed were very interesting. They were three movements from his Damnation de Faust—'Menuet des Feux-follets' 'Ballet des Sylphes' and 'Marche Hongroise.' The Menuet in spiritual and taking, rather than beautiful; but the Valse, for muted violins, now and then some flutes, reeds, and horns, with harp obbligato, is a gem. It was enthusiastically bissée. The 'Marche Hongroise' is maddening—a good movement. It is one of the most entrainant things that I know of in music. We next had a Suite for orchestra by Saint-Saëns, conducted by the composer. It is what the newspaper critics call 'a thoughtful and musician-like composition' for the legitimate old Mozart or Haydn orchestra, which had rather a soothing effect after Berlioz, who would make music out of a cart-load of bricks if it came into his head to do so. There are many and great beauties in it, and also much science, the introductory pastorale, in especial, being at times painfully contrapuntal. But the whole had rather the air of a first-rate exercise than a composition for the concert-room. Somehow these modern Frenchmen, when they write anything in the extreme classical and nasenational way, remind me of a passage in Thackeray referring to Pendennis and Blanche Amory; 'O! Phyllis and Corydon! Here are two young London rakes, talking about country lanes, and imagining themselves in love.' (Jo change, peutêtre, quelque chose au texte, mois c'est le fond des idées.')

"We then had an air from Mozart's Prise de Jericho (whatever that may be) sung by Mdlle. Reboux. Then followed a fragment for chorus, solo, soprano, and orchestra. 'L'exorcism des Djinns,' from the "Selom" Symphonie orientale, by Beyer, conducted by the composer. Very fine and exciting; well sustained and full of fire. Then came the Beethoven Symphony in A. Pretty well played. The orchestras here don't seem to enter into the spirit of Beethoven's later works. The allegretto was better given than I have ever heard it. Imagine the whole operabouse at each pause in the movement and at each stage in the crescendo shouting bravo, as only Frenchmen can shout. When the 'cello and violas had finished the theme in A minor, Bravo! When the 2nd violins had done, Bravo! Bravo! When the whole orchestra had repeated the theme, BRAVO!!! Hah! ouhs! Hah!!!—When the theme in A major, for flutes, clarionets, and bassoons, with waving accompaniment for violins, modulated into C major, Ahh—h! Oh! Bravo!—and at every brave old Litolff would wave his bâton more ferociously.

"Then came a most beautiful march for strings and flutes, and a solo and chorus from Gluck's Alceste, given to perfection. The march was interspersed with 'Ah's!' and 'Oh's!'—Then came Schumann's 'Träumerei' from the Kinder-Scenen, arranged for muted strings, oboe, and horn, wonderfully played. This sort of thing is very much the fashion here; but I think I like it on the piano better. It was bissée. Then followed a scherzo of Schumann's, which was very pretty and took well. The whole thing wound up with the 'Hallelujah Chorus'—pronounced Allelwia, with a decided French 'u'—'Il reignera,' etc., sung with great spirit and precision however. I am not sure that I don't prefer the chorus without organ, and sung and played as perfectly as it was last night, to our accustomed style. Every vocal and instrumental part stood out distinctly. The tenors especially were splendidly metallic and strong.

[It is to be hoped that the whole of the foregoing will be taken cum grano salis. The mere idea of M. Pasdeloup's orchestra playing "to perfection" is enough.—ED.]

BALLAD CONCERTS.

The first concert of the new year took place on Wednesday night, when Mr. John Boosey's annual series (the fourth) of four ballad concerts commenced at St. James's Hall. The programme was similar in character of previous entertainments; consisting mostly of ballads. Several new compositions of this class were brought forward and received with a hearty welcome. That the pieces had full justice done to them may be inferred from the names of the vocalists engaged:—Mesdames Sherrington, Patey, and Anna Jewell; Mdlle. Liebhart, Miss Julia Elton, Mr. Santley, Mr. Montem Smith, and Mr. Patey. Among the successes of the evening was Mr. Arthur Sullivan's "Birds in the Night" (a serenade from Cox and Box set to fresh words), which was sung by Madame Sherrington. Mdlle. Liebhart also gained great applause for her piquant delivery of a new song, "Some other day," by Offenbach. Another new song, "Half-mast high"—announced as "the last composition of Claribel"—was among the special features of the programme, and, as sung by Miss Julia Elton, was received with much applause; as was also a third novelty of similar character, entitled "Since long ago," the production of Mrs. Alfred Phillips—the singer in this case being Madame Patey, whose fine voice and style the new song showed all possible advantage. Still another novelty (or quasi-novelty) was Miss Virginia Gabriel's "Remembered," gracefully sung by Mr. Montem Smith. Although nearly all the ballads were of home manufacture, there were some of special interest. Schubert's "Whither?" effectively sung by Mdlle. Liebhart, and Haydn's "She never told her love," given with genuine pathos by Madame Patey. The modern style was well contrasted with several specimens of the old English school—among the rest, Boyce's "Heart of Oak," finely declaimed by Mr. Santley (the verses repeated), and "I am a Friar of Orders Grey," capitally sung by Mr. Patey. The first part comprised, besides pieces already enumerated, Linley's "Primroses deck the bank's green side," sung by Miss Julia Elton; Bishop's "Come live with me and be my love," by Madame Anna Jewell; Hatton's "Christmas Bells"—which derived its fullest effect from Mr. Santley's delivery, and was one of the encores of the evening; and Miss Virginia Gabriel's "Yet once again," given in the form of duet singing by Mr. and Madame Patey. The programme comprised many more ballads unnecessary to particularize. Several part-songs were effectively sung by the Orpheus Glee Union. The vocal music was very agreeably contrasted with some brilliant pianoforte playing by Madame Arabella Goddard, who gave Benedict's effective fantasia on subjects from Der Freischütz, and Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," with splendid execution, and, being unanimously and persistently encored in the former, substituted, with no less effect, Thalberg's "Last Rose of Summer." Mr. Hatton accompanied most of the pieces. The hall was well attended, and the vehemence of the applause proved that the entertainment was thoroughly enjoyed.

H. L.

LEIPSIC.—Herr and Mdme. Jaell played at the tenth Gewandhaus Concert. Their joint performance of Bach's D minor Concerto for two pianos, and Reinecke's "Improvisata," on the old French national song, "La belle Griselda," was greatly applauded. Herr Jaell played, also, the Concertstück in G major, Op. 92, by Robert Schumann. Mdme. Peschka-Leutner sang two arietias from Handel's Susannah, and recitative and air from Weber's Euryanthe. The band performed the Coriolenus overture, and the B flat major symphony of Beethoven.

A WORD FOR BEETHOVEN.

"QUITE superfluous!"—do you say? We think not. It is true that the name of Beethoven is great among us; that those of his compositions we can understand are applauded to the skies; that all the others are heard with a firm faith in their greatness; and that to say a word against Beethoven is to commit unpardonable blasphemy. Nevertheless, Beethoven has scarcely been adopted by England, as have Handel and Mendelssohn. He is still, to some extent, a name rather than a power; a vaguely defined idea of something big, with its head in the clouds, rather than a personality known and "read" of all men. Because this is so, there is need to preach Beethoven till he occupies his rightful place, till he reigns in the heart of the nation, as well as receive, the homage of its intellect.

A good opportunity for preaching Beethoven will come to us with next December. True, it is a "far cry" to next December; but we want to give timely warning. A good deal might be done in eleven months; and if the chance pass, the fault will not lie at our door. Be it known, then, that the 17th of December, 1870, will bring the centenary of Beethoven's birth; and, in connexion with that event, there should happen a commemorative festival such as might force some notion of the man's greatness upon the masses of our countrymen. Stimulants to this end are not wanting. Let us look at some of them.

The event itself is worth some little honour, so long as times and seasons are observed among us. Need we assert that Beethoven's genius was the greatest ever sent out of heaven, or that the full extent and power of it has yet to be manifested? These things are patent. Since, then, we keep high festival over anniversaries having to do with men below Beethoven in stature, why not keep highest festival over the Beethoven centenary. Let us be consistent in this matter; above all, let us give no cause for a belief that we can make a fuss about men only when fussiness is likely to be profitable.

There is another reason why something should be done next December. It is not pleasant to be left behind in any worthy race. Moreover, in a race for art-honours, England can, least of all, afford to lose. Rightly or wrongly, we have a great reputation for Philistinism; the taint of "shopkeeping" clings to us, and we are supposed to import artistic things as exotics for the refined few. Because this is not wholly true, it is the more unpleasant, and no chance should be lost of giving it the lie. But the chance will elude us if Germany and France, and even the United States, show a greater appreciation of Beethoven than we do ourselves. In each of those countries, earnest men are already hard at work for the master's honour. Germany, of course, may be expected to take the lead, and Bonn will, once more, for a while, be the musical capital of Fatherland. But shall New York shame London? That it will do so, unless we bestir ourselves, the following extract from an American journal shows:—

"This proposed imposing festival in honour of the greatest musician that ever lived is now the 'town talk.' The idea is said to have had birth in the fertile brain of Dr. R. Ogden Doremus, and was moulded into shape by frequent discussions between the directors of the Philharmonic Society and outsiders of musical taste. Subsequently, a call was issued for a general meeting of the 'heavy' men, and the result was that money enough was represented by managers' names to buy Central Park ten times over.

"Soon after this a meeting of organists and choir-masters was called, which was numerously attended, and resolutions were adopted expressive of their full concurrence with the grand scheme, and determination to do all in their power to further it by recruiting singers from all quarters.

"As for ourselves, we rejoice with more of the Psalmist's 'exceeding great joy' than can well be expressed, that so grand and honourable a design has been safely launched, and that it now rests in such good hands.

"It is intended to have a building erected for the purpose in Central Park, and rumour has it already that the renowned genius of architecture, Mr. J. Wrey Mold, has been commissioned to draw plans for the same. We hope this is true, for apart from the acknowledged genius of that gentleman in his profession, he is also a deeply read musical student, and this last will be of infinite service to him for planning a building for musical purposes.

"Success to the Beethoven Centennial!"

Clearly, there is no time for us to lose—if we mean to do anything at all, and not let the occasion pass ingloriously by.

The question—What shall be done?—is a wide one, and must be considered in detail. First, let us follow the example of New York, and co-operate. Every society might keep the feast in its own way; but there should be a colossal manifestation of the kind that alone adequately impresses the popular mind. Grant this, and the first step is taken in the direction of one and honourable to all concerned in reaching it. We need not here discuss particulars. For that there will be time enough. Meanwhile, will the leaders of music in England give heed to the coming event? Let us hope so.

ARABELLA GODDARD AT GREENOCK.

(From the "Greenock Telegraph," Dec. 15.)

On Monday, Greenock was honoured with the presence of Madame Arabella Goddard, the pride of the three kingdoms as a pianoforte artist, and without a rival the first lady executant in the realm. That the Temperance Institute (we deeply regret to say) was but meagrely attended, we must attribute wholly to the very boisterous weather; as, doubtless, on the occasion of an event like this, more tickets would be eagerly bought up a week before the time than would fill the hall to overflowing. As it was, however, to appearance, such a welcome of so great an artist—and a lady, too—Greenock nor the world at large never witnessed. We are thankful that the programme was—by Madame Goddard's amiability—proceeded with; and she never played better, even in her warmth of inspired enthusiasm to a few friends than she did last night. She opened the programme with a sonata, peculiarly her own (she was the first to introduce it at the Monday Popular Concerts in London), Mozart's No. 5, in B flat, and under her elastic fingers, new beauties sprang forth in musical colouring, such as must have astonished every amateur present. The light pearly treble was enchanting. The allegro was taken well up to time, the andante amoroso a little slower than usual, and the rondo played with as with a pet canary, so frolicsome, so gay, so wonderful throughout.

A selection of five movements from the eighth and last book of Mendelssohn's Lieder ohne Worte followed. As comparatively unfinished snatches from the imagination of the most young and fertile musician of his age, these are buoyant and refreshing, although we would not have given book one, number one, or the "Bees' Wedding" for the whole of the five movements. The third piece, Weber's Invitation pour la Valse, was in some respects the gem of the evening. This is in the very frame-work of the style in which Madame Goddard takes the lead of all pianists. No fingering could be more perfect, more liquid, more equal and even than hers in the exacting right-hand passages, the manipulation of which seemed to strike every one with wonderment. The storm of applause at its close was almost as refreshing as the piece itself, and something to remember. In the opening of the second part, we had the classical work of the evening—the famous grand sonata of Beethoven in D, Op. 28 (the Pastoral). It was exquisitely delivered—like a fine spic poem, from beginning to end. The andante, in D minor, indeed, we have never heard so well played—not only with wonderfully-sustained expression, but with a new reading, as it seemed to us, of the major episode. The witty scherzo was also most bewitchingly played; and so was the eccentric rondo, which was captivating. But we can do nothing but praise such a truly gifted artist as Arabella Goddard; so when we further say that, in answer to two enthusiastic recalls, she played Thalberg's "Home, sweet Home," as she only can play it, and an arrangement of the "Last Rose of Summer"—partly Thalberg and mostly Goddard—we must wish her God speed. We have been highly honoured by her visit, as we have before said; but we should feel heartily ashamed to invite her back again. We might have expected our whole musical population up and waiting to receive with open arms this eminent lady—the first, the best, the greatest honour to our nation, in her sphere, of the women of our age. In Glasgow, in Edinburgh, in Liverpool, in Manchester, in London, in every town and city of consideration in the three kingdoms, the name of Arabella Goddard is the signal for a crowded attendance, and we are of opinion that even at the antipodes nothing short of an earthquake could prevent the rising of every white-faced man to do the celebrated lady honour.

Miss Annie Edmonds gave, at intervals, some very quaint and semi-classical snatches of song. In every instance she was happy and pleasing.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

THE second of the Royal Artillery Concerts, under the direction of Mr. J. Smyth, band-master, took place on Wednesday, before a large audience of officers and friends, who were much gratified. The orchestra, consisting of about seventy performers, gave Schubert's Symphony, No. 8, in B minor, Mendelssohn's overture to Meeresstille, and a selection from Le premier Jour de Bonheur, finishing with Carl Vogler's waltz, "The Rosario." The performance proved the admirable tact and judgment displayed by Mr. Smyth in drilling the orchestra to its present state of perfection. An oboe solo, played by Sergeant Jones, who possesses a very fine tone and excellent execution, diversified the programme, together with some part-songs, sung by the members of the band. A solo, by Sergeant A. Mansfield, was also heard with pleasure and applauded.

MISS JOHN MACFARREN gave a second concert of pianoforte and vocal music, under the auspices of the Islington Literary Society, on Thursday, December 30. Mrs. Macfarren's solos were the adagio and rondo from Beethoven's sonata in B flat, Vincent Wallace's "Etude de Concert," Sydney Smith's "Tarantelle" in E minor, and her own caprice, "The Pearl of Erin." She was assisted by Mr. Walter Macfarren, in his new duet, "Fête d'hiver sur la glace," and in Osborne's "Les Huguenots." An attractive feature of the programme was Miss Jessie Royd's singing of "Lo, here the gentle lark," with Mr. Churchill Artidge's flute obbligato. Miss Annie Sinclair and Signor Bellini sang with much spirit the buffo duet from Ricci's Crispino e la Comare, and Miss Emma Forbes effectively gave the bravura, "He is gone," from G. A. Macfarren's Sleeper Awakened; Misses Royd, Sinclair, and Forbes sang the trio from Il matrimonio segreto, as well as Mr. Lewis, and Signor Bellini gained a like compliment in Mattei's "Il farfallone." The concert gave manifest satisfaction. Mr. Walter Macfarren acted as accompanist.

THE "London and Westminster Working Men's Constitutional Association" gave a concert the other night in aid of its library and reading-room fund. There was a very fair audience, the majority of whom took such a lively interest in the proceedings that they applauded everything without distinction. The chief feature of the evening was Mr. Charles Malcolm, who was introduced, by a circular distributed with the book of words, as a special interpreter of Abbé Liszt. The compositions of that "magnificent master" and "profound musician" are, it appears, "but seldom heard, in consequence of their presenting difficulties of execution which no ordinary player can overcome." Happily, "sixteen years of constant work have enabled Mr. Malcolm to attain that command of his instrument which is essential to their development." This contingency excited by this announcement was strengthened when Mr. Malcom played, very badly, the pianoforte part of Mozart's Sonata in A major (Op. 13). It was evident that his study of Liszt had been exclusive. But, after a performance of Abbé Liszt's fantasia on Rigoletto, it was no less evident that even exclusive study had served Mr. Melcolm little. He must be congratulated, however, on his choice of a master, because in a rhapsody of Liszt a few false notes more or less are of no particular account. Among other noteworthy things were Mr. John Thorpe's capital performance of his own new harp fantasia on airs from Marta, and a violin solo by Herr Carl Deichmann. The vocal music—ballads for the most part—was contributed by Miss Kingsley, Miss F. Poole, Miss Milton, Messrs. Carter, Lawler, and Dawson. The last named gentleman acted also as director of the concert.

BRESCIA.—A very successful performance of Rossini's Mosse Solennelle was lately given by the Società del Concerti.

THERE is an opera-house in Guadalajara, Mexico, on the Plata, fronting the Palace, erected by the city, but not yet finished. It has already cost 350,000 dols. in coin, and will require 50,000 dols. more. It is occupied, but has little scenery, only a white cloth drag curtain and white-washed walls. The proportions are magnificent, and the house will seat 4,000 persons comfortably and be one of the finest on the continent.

MADAME OURY, the accomplished pianist, has been presented by the publishers of her "Souvenir d'Ecosse" (first introduced at the Edinburgh audience by Madame Arabella Goddard) with a handsome gold watch and chain bearing the following inscription:—"From Messrs. Paterson & Sons to Madame Oury, as a testimonial for 'Mos Souvenirs d'Ecosse.'"

LIVERPOOL.—From a Liverpool journal we extract the following about Madame Sinico's singing in the Messiah at the Philharmonic :—

"Madame Sinico's execution of the soprano part was highly satisfactory, especially in pronunciation—he more to be wondered at considering that she has hitherto confined her efforts almost exclusively to Italian. The purity of her delivery in 'Rejoice greatly' was especially noticeable; and this proved on the whole her greatest success. Her share of 'He shall feed His flock' was remarkable for true vocal art and refined religious sentiment."

BRIGHTON.—A correspondent sends these particulars :—

"The concert given on Tuesday by the Sacred Harmonic Society was very successful, from a musical point of view. Miss Blanche Cole (especially in 'I know that my Redeemer liveth'), Miss Julia Elton, Mr. George Perren (notably in 'Thou shalt break them'), and Mr. Winn were highly successful. Among the principal instrumentalists were Mr. Gutteridge (leader), Mr. Nibbs (violinist), Mr. Roe (organ), and Mr. Landfried (trumpet). Mr. T. W. Wisite conducted.—Mr. Santley's announced concert for the 24th inst. is attracting considerable attention from the amateurs of Brighton. Mr. Santley is to be assisted by Madame Sinico, Miss Annie Edmonds, Miss D'Alton, Herr Wilhelmj, and Madame Arabella Goddard."

LIMERICK.—In the Limerick Chronicle, December 18, we read that :—

"Mr. de Pin's two concerts took place, the first in the Theatre Royal, last evening, and the second in the Athenæum this afternoon. Taken as a whole these concerts were most agreeable, and gave considerable satisfaction to the large and respectable audience. Miss Marie Stocken made a perfect conquest of her audience last evening. This young and fascinating artist is possessed of an exceedingly mellow and perfectly educated soprano voice. Her various efforts to please her not easily satisfied audience were more than successful. In the 'Echo' song, Miss Stocken was really fascinating, her grace and demeanour co-operating powerfully with the charm of her voice. Most anxious to please, this young lady responded to the frequent encores which poured upon her, ad finium" (sic), "from all parts of the house."

It is very evident that Miss Stocken "made a perfect conquest" of at least one among her audience.

CORWEN.—In a letter from this North Cambrian town we read :—

"Miss Anna Jones (of the London Academy of Music) gave her first public concert on December 22nd. It was a complete success, the room being crowded in every part. She was assisted by Miss Meenan (pupil of Madame Lemmens-Sherrington) and Mr. Lenton (of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society). The charming cadze, 'Il Bacio,' by F. Schira, admirably rendered by Miss Anna Jones, was encored, and 'O luce di quest Anima,' substituted. Her other songs were very effectively sung. Miss Jones undoubtedly possesses a mezzo-soprano voice of great power and sweetness. Miss Meenan was heard to great advantage in 'Home, sweet Home' and 'Il Segreto.' Mr. Lenton's voice was very telling in Gounod's 'Nazareth' and 'The brave old Oak.' We must not omit to mention 'La ci darem,' sung by Miss Anna Jones and Mr. Lenton, and loudly redemanded. Mr. Rawlings, accompanist, played Thalberg's 'Home, sweet Home,' and Schnloff's 'Carnival de Venice.'"

EDINBURGH.—Says a correspondent :—

"A large audience attended the first 'Classical Chamber Concert,' in the Freemasons' Hall. The following programme was gone through with credit to the artists and satisfaction to the audience :—

'Sonata, Op. 45, piano and violoncello, Mendelssohn; Song, "Mid the Light Ripples," Schubert; Solo, Violin Concerto (Dramatic), Spohr; Aria, "S'altro che Lagrime," Mozart; Quartet in E flat, Op. 74, Beethoven; Song, "Abendlied," Schumann; Trio in B flat, Op. 99, Schubert.'

"Mendelssohn's sonata was entrusted to Mr. Adlington and Herr Daubert, and Spohr's violin concerto to Mr. A. Kuchler, who proved himself an accomplished violinist. Beethoven's quartet was capitally played by Messrs. Mackenzie, Kuchler, Meeks, and Daubert, and Schubert's trio by Messrs. Adlington, Kuchler, and Daubert. Miss Ellen Anderson was the vocalist, and acquitted herself satisfactorily, especially in Mozart's aria from La Clemenza di Tito. Mr. Mackenzie accompanied the vocal music in musicianly style. The next concert is announced for the 18th inst."

CROYDON.—A correspondent sends the following from this semi-metropolitan place :—

"Mr. George Russell's annual concert is always looked forward to with interest by amateurs here, because the programme is sure to contain music of the best class. The concert given in the Public Hall on Wednesday evening, the 15th ult., was no exception to the general rule. Among the principal pieces played by Mr. Russell were Sterndale Bennett's Caprice in E (with quintet accompaniment by Messrs. Buziau, Viereck, West, Reed, and Percival), Hummel's Quintet in E flat minor, Chopin's grand Scherzo in B flat, and a duet by Mendelssohn for violoncello and piano. These were executed so as to satisfy the most fastidious connoisseur, and that they were appreciated by the audience was beyond hardly remark. As a contrast to the foregoing Mr. Russell played a cleverly written 'show-piece' of his own, in the form of a Volka de Concert, which, by-the-bye, we think he introduced at his concert last year. Besides this Mr. Russell gave specimens of his vocal compositions, 'The Cottage Window' and 'Friend-ship' (the latter encored), both of which are charming, and were charmingly sung by Miss Banks. Mr. Russell also played the pianoforte accompaniment to Mendelssohn's violin concerto, the violin part being in the hands of M. Buziau. Mr. George Perren and Miss Eatman were the other vocalists, the latter gaining a well deserved encore for Claribel's 'Strangers yet.' The concert, which ended with the laughing trio by Martini, gave entire satisfaction."

STROUD.—About a recent concert in this Gloucestrian town, a correspondent says :—

"A concert was given on the 30th ult., in the Subscription Rooms, which have recently been altered and tastefully decorated. A large audience attended, and the proceeds are to benefit the Hospital. The vocalists were Mdlle. Liebhart, Miss Fanny Armytage, Miss Lana Baxter, Mr. S. Bejjeman, and Mr. Harley Vinning; instrumentalists, Mr. H. Blagrove and Mr. Sidney Smith; conductor, Mr. C. J. Hargitt. Mdlle. Liebhart sang 'Roberto, tu che adoro' and 'Little bird, so sweetly singing,' which latter was encored. In response, Mdlle. Liebhart, substituted a piquant rendering of 'Oh dear! what can the matter be?' Miss Armytage's lofty sighs and tears made much effect in a seasonable ballad of her own composition, called 'Under the Mistletoe.' Miss Baxter was recalled after Benedict's 'By the sad sea waves,' and a similar compliment was paid to Mr. Bejjeman for his 'Death of Nelson.' Mr. Harley Vinning showed considerable dramatic feeling in Duggan's 'Samson,' and was recalled. He was also very successful in Molloy's 'Vagabond,' both songs being well suited to his voice. Mr. Blagrove played De Beriot's Rondo Russe; and Mr. Sidney Smith, in one of his own charming compositions, was highly successful. The concerted music, under Mr. C. J. Hargitt's guidance, was well sung, especially Signor Randegger's trio, 'I Naviganti.'"

Shuber Silber across the "Bohemienne," &c.

Paris, Jan. 4.—La Bohémienne has been produced; and the public of the Théâtre Lyrique, more than that of any other theatre in Paris, trained upon masterpieces, appears satisfied. Balfe's opera had already been played in French, at Rouen—at the theatre to which Madame Dovary, M. Bovary, and the "little student" went, on a night well known to novel readers, to hear Lucie. In crossing the channel the parts have somehow got inverted. French critics look upon the Queen of the Gipsies as the principal character; whereas, in England, Arline, who dreamt she dwelt in marble halls, is the heroine, the Gipsy Queen being a subordinate personage. Now of his own work I have the impression that the Bohemian Girl was Arline. She is not a Bohemian; but she is at least a girl, while the Gipsy Queen is neither girl nor Bohemian. However, as the Gipsy Queen is now the chief character, we must assume that it is she, and not the kidnapped daughter of Count Arnheim, who gives a title to the work. In the French, "Arline" becomes "Sarah." There is no great harm in that;—the daughter of an Austrian nobleman might, no doubt, be called "Sarah." But fancy "Stenio," for "Thaddeus," as the hero—a proscribed Pole! Fancy, the gipsy chief of her tribe, being styled "Queen Mab!" The indifference of composers as to the meaning of "words" is well known. We wonder if all the same that Mr. Balfe did not think it worth while to point out that "Stenio" is not the name for a son of that "fair land of Poland," which, according to the late Mr. Bunn, was "ploughed by the hoof," and that "Mab" is not the name of a gipsy, but of a fairy queen. One would have thought that this fact in Shakspearean mythology must be known to every one, if only from Mercutio's "Ballade de la Reine Mab," in Gounod's Roméo et Giulietta.

M. Weber, writing in Le Temps, says that the piece is in the melodramatic style, the music in the style of opéra comique. Another critic describes the music as composed in that mixed style, half italian, half French, cultivated by Nicolai, Flotow, and other composers in Germany. Théodore de Banville, paradoxical author of Odes Funambulesques—in prose as in verse, always on the tight rope—executes a pas seul, to the accompaniment of M. Balfe's music, in the National. He throws his adjectives about in marvellous style. The action of the piece takes place "dans un cadre curieux, vivant, pittoresque." The "intérêt" is "toujours ardent renouvelé, palpitant de ce poème agissant et passionné;"

and "la musique de Balfe, brulante, amoureuse, extasiée et vraiment dramatique, avec son entrain haletant et déchaîné, sa verve somptueuse, son éclat fascinateur et splendide"—one adjective in every three words! Neither Paul de St. Victor nor Théophile Gautier could do more. Being a poet, M de Banville sees at once what other critics do not discover—that M. de St. George's libretto, far from being a convent melo-drama, is a masterpiece. So is the ballet of La Givana, on which the Bohemian Girl is founded. So is Cervantes' Gipsy of Madrid—a masterpiece, not only as a tale but as a study of manners—from which both are derived.

Among the most successful pieces "la romance du rêve dite par Sarah" is mentioned. But we find no reference to our melancholy old friend, "The heart bowed down with weight of woe;" nor is the tenor solo cited. That must be the fault of the tenor, as every one will admit who has heard "When other lips" sung by Mario, Giuglini, or Sims Reeves.

A monthly review was started on the 1st of January, at Florence, under the ample title of Authors' rights in respect to Literary Articles and Musical Works, and to Dramatic and Lyrical Representations. An "office for authors' rights" is established in connection with this journal, and said office will undertake to correspond "in distinctively" with authors, in Italian, French, Latin, German, and Spanish. The review devotes itself in particular to articles and reports on international copyright, and is published under the direction of Signor Enrico Sciajola, son of the late Minister Antonio Sciajola, known as author and proposer of the International Copyright Act, passed in 1865, between Italy and France. The Review will turn for documents and decisions affecting its views to the Italian Government, which promises support, and seems resolved to take energetic steps for the protection of Italian composers and authors against foreign pirates.

At Madrid, the French Minister has, at the instance of M. Hervé, called upon the director of one of the theatres to abstain from performing a Spanish version of La Petit Faust, which the adapter, with brilliant originality, has called Mefistofeles. French authors and composers are terribly swindled; neither their own customs and laws, nor the artistic conditions of other European countries, allow them to retaliate. But it appears absurd that diplomatic action should be taken in an affair where legal process ought to suffice. Fancy the French ambassador in London prote-ting against the frauds practised by English adapters on the dramatists of France! The weakness, in an international sense, of the French position is this:—France produces every year a dozen pieces which are played in the rest of Europe; whereas the rest of Europe does not, in a dozen years, produce one piece which is played in France. RUSSIAN OPERA IN NEW YORK.

The New York correspondent of a Philadelphia paper gives an amusing account of the Russian opera company at the Théâtre Français. He says:—

"As Russian baths are all the rage with us, I suppose it was natural enough for the Russian opera to visit us also, and try to make itself a popularity. I have a great respect for the Russian bear, but, 'poo rep,' as Ainsworth says, I cannot bear that bath or the opera we have imported from St. Petersburgh. The Russian opera is, in fact, judging from what I saw of it at the Théâtre Française on Wednesday night, the funniest solemnity, or the most solemn funniness, I have ever witnessed. The Russian opera troupe is unmistakably Muscovite. It is none of your make-believes. There are thirty-two members of it, counting in all its attachés, and every soul has a name that you can only pronounce by sneezing three times, coughing twice, and then saying through your nose, 'Skoldirovinski.' If you are afflicted with a chronic catarrh and a dislocated jawbone, it is surprising with what an approach to accuracy you can roll out the patronymics of these Sclavonic vocalists. There is but one g-nt-leman of the press here, though, who pronounces those names in perfection and with a melodious ease that renders him the envy of the profession. He is the dramatic critic of a new weekly paper called The Insomnious Weasel. He fell off the front platform and under the wheels of a Third Avenue railroad car, about a month ago, and had his head horribly smashed. It was thought he would die at the time, but he recovered, and the pronunciation of Russian has been his spécialité ever since!

"The Russian opera troupe has a handsome capital in gold, and pays its way independent of all contingencies, like a Czar. It only arrived here some three weeks ago, but it 'fell among thieves'—to use Biblical diction—and suffered accordingly. It gave one concert, which was so well advertized that nobody heard of it except a junk-dealer down in Baxter Street, and he went in as a 'dead-head.' The receipts of that concert summed up, I am told, just forty-one dollars and fifty cents, while the bill brought in by the agent for advertising alone came to exactly two thousand and seventeen dollars! Is it any wonder that the thirty-two Muscovy ducks proposed an immediate flight, in disgust, back again to the banks of the romantic Neva, the picturesqas Volga, &c.? They incontinently took passage for Europe in the steamer of last Saturday, but were encountered on the gang-plank, as it were, going on board by manager Taylesure. He has a tongue which drops the 'bonny of Hyshe,' and a manner so genial and prepossessing that it is irresistible. Five minutes' conversation with Taylesure induced the chef of the Russian opera corps to conclude to lose a few thousand dollars more in this benighted city, and consequently we had Verstovski's Askoldova Mogila, a comic opera, the leading scene of which is cheerfully laid in a graveyard! The corpses did not rise from their tombs to chant funeral knells to polacca music, but they might as well; for it is the perfection of Muscovite art to walk the stage after the fashion of Hamlet's father, with arms folded in repose, to exhibit the most imperturbable contempt for all displays of emotion and to sing nothing but dismal airs, occasionally accompanied by a deadly lively chorus. Any respectable town-pump could act as gracefully as a Russian prima donna, and far more demonstratively so far as the gesture of the arms is concerned. I am not sure that, with a vigorous effort at the ungreased handle, a decent pump could not favour us with an equally effective melody. Such grotesque costumes, too, as these Russians wear on the stage! And such petrifying dances as they amaze us with! Such unparalleled uniqueness in every thing! But I will say no more, lest your readers, oh! good Dispatch! all rush on here en masse to escape dying of curiosity, and so leave your city a 'desolate and aching void'—which heaven forfend! But no matter; I have seen the Russian opera! Nuff sed."

On the same subject the New York Weekly Review observes:—

"The introduction of Russian opera at the French Theatre had in every respect the charm of novelty. The language, the music, the costumes, and especially the acting, all combined to present a very peculiar and novel entertainment. Perhaps the only exception was the music, which sounded like that of a good German scholar, although written by a thorough Russian—Verstovskaja. This composer evidently knows his profession. The treatment of the ideas is skilful and artistic, and the handling of the orchestra very often superb. The ideas themselves have the stamp of the Russian nationality, but are not strikingly original. They are, on the whole, exceedingly doleful and gloomy, and made us start with surprise when we read that 'Asoold's Tomb' was intended to be a comic opera! The entire audience seemed to share our impression, for the further the opera proceeded, the sadder everybody seemed to look. Whether it is the spirit of oppression under which the Russian people have suffered so long or not, certain it is that this music is very apt to produce a great depression of feeling, and we doubt whether even Mark Tapley—while listening to it for some time—could preserve his well-known jollity."

Madame Borghi-Mamo and Signor Junca are engaged at Venice, for the carnival season. They will appear in Donizetti's Parisina.

Mdlle. Nilsson was to reappear at the Grand Opéra on Monday last, in Hamlet—of which she must be pretty well tired we imagine.

Flotow's new opera, L'Ombra, is proposed to be put in rehearsal at the Opéra-Comique. Madame Ugalde will take the principal part.

The director of the Hague opera has renounced Rienzi, which had previously been announced. This is a good case of timely wisdom.

According to La Télégraphe, Prince Poniatowski's Pierre de Médicis was a great success at Milan. The Prince was "called" eight times.

The first twenty representations of La Princesse de Trebisonde, produced 86,622 francs. Who would not be an Offenbach, from a financial point of view?

Mdlle. Liebhart is engaged as prima donna by the directors of the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden. Mdlle. Liebhart joins the troupe on their provincial tour at the end of February.

Of M. Lefebure Wely, the great French organist and composer, who died suddenly last week, we shall have something to say in our next number. He was at least a "notability."

The Rotterdam opera has brought out Wagner's Flying Dutchman with success. We wonder if success is due to the odd notion of a Dutchman being able to fly under any circumstances!

A Conservatoire jury (Paris) did a terrible day's work on Thursday week. It listened to, and pronounced upon the ability of 130 pianists. The members are reported as well as can be expected.

Virginie Morel (Baronne de Verger) since a pianist of note, died in Paris, December 17th, at the age of 70. She was a pupil of Louis Adam; and, at one time, pianist to the Duchess de Berry.

M. Pasdeloup's programme last Sunday was as follows:—Overture (Oberon), Weber; Pastoral Symphony, Beethoven; Air de ballet, Dardanus), Rameau; Prelude (Lohengrin), Wagner; music to A Midsummer Night's Dream, Mendelssohn.

The father of Mdlle. Christine Nilsson (in Sweden) being dangerously ill, it was doubtful, according to our latest advice, whether she would be able, for some time at least, to make her rentrée, as Ophelia, in Hamlet, at the Grand Opéra.

The Roman censorship has been doing fine things lately. It has ordained that the music of the Huguenots in Meyerbeer's work shall be given to the Catholics; that Mephisto in Faust shall be a doctor; and that the monastery in La Favorita shall be a hospital.

Napoleon III. pays for his box at the Opera, 100,000 francs annually; at the Opéra-Comique Italiens, and Théâtre Français, 30,000 francs; at the Gymnase and Odéon, 10,000 francs. No wonder that the Government proposes to put an end to such extravagance.

Mdlle. Maria Rose has made her début at the Grand Opéra in Paris, as Marguerite, in Faust, with moderate success. It is but fair to add that she was suddenly called upon to replace Madame Miolan-Carvalho, and had had no rehearsal. Moreover, the vast stage of the Opéra was quite foreign to her experience.

At the annual general meeting of the subscribers to the Llandaff Diocesan Church Choral Association, held on Tuesday, at the Cardiff Town Hall, the Lord Bishop of Llandaff in the chair, it was arranged that a Festival of the English Choirs should take place in Llandaff Cathedral on Wednesday, the 20th of July.

A new Mass, in D, composed by Mr. George D. Butler, who is well known in Australia as a distinguished amateur and composer, was produced, for the first time in this country, on Sunday last, in the Roman Catholic Chapel, Grove-end Road, under the direction of the composer. The soli parts were sustained by Miss Bailey, Madame Laura Baxter, Mr. Larwell, and Mr. Perugini. There was a large auditory of professors and others, who appeared much pleased with the music. Mr. Charles Hargitt presided; the whole performance was satisfactory.

The Leeds papers announce the first performance, on the 14th inst., by the Madrigal and Motet Society (Lord Londesborough, president), of Dr. Bennett's Woman of Samaria, to be followed by a miscellaneous selection. The principals are Mdlle. Clara Doria, Miss Annie Anyon, Mr. George Perren, and Mr. G. Hale Rushworth. Mr. Burton will conduct, and Dr. Spark presides at the grand organ, on which instrument the work will be accompanied. The chorus numbers about 200 singers, who have been for years under Dr. Spark's training, and who sang at the recent Nilsson Festival Choral Concerts. Such a combination, at moderate charges of admission, ought to command the support of Leeds amateurs; and we trust to be able to record a triumphant success both for Dr. Bennett's work, and the undertaking quand même.

There is aggressive amateurism in New York, as in London, and it has moved the Orpheonist thus to speak about one of its manifestations:—

"A lady, 'distinguished amateur' and 'from Paris,' has been singing at the Academy of Music. We cannot think of infringing so much upon the sacred limits of domestic privacy as to mention this Parisian denizen's name, nor can we even allow ourselves to attempt to describe her performance; it would be a presumption, for how could we be qualified to judge such exalted beings as 'amateurs,' and 'from Paris,' too? When the lady condescends to do something for Art, resigns foreign affectations (which also always flavour American 'Stilton' cheese), and rises to the dignity of a professed countrywoman and a confessed artist, when she can summon courage sufficient to snap her fingers in the faces of the addle-pated sprats of effete New York 'fashionable' society, then, and not till then, may we in conscience do her the honour and ourselves the unalloyed pleasure of sounding her name abroad. We regretted this lady's appearance at the Philharmonic rehearsal of November 12. It was a reprehensible innovation, and a dangerous precedent. We thought that the Philharmonic was for artists, and for none but artists. To turn our glorious society into a place for the vain-glorious display of any mere amateur is questionable policy, at best."

The following bit of characteristic criticism appeared recently in the New York Orpheonist. The lash might be similarly applied in this country with good effect:—

"Mr. J. E. Hammer, whose education is European, whose profession is that of pianist, and whose picture not only adorns bar-rooms and music-stores, but also an entire page of his programme, gave his first matinée at Steinway Hall on November 20th. We are always afraid of these 'furnish-taught' chaps, who know so much and play so splendidly, and our native modesty will assert itself—paralyzing our arm as soon as we attempt a critique upon them. If we differ with their opinions, we tremble lest they may retort by shaking an old cigar stump of Von Bülow, or a worn out toothpick of Tausig in our face, to prove the incontestibility of their claims to the respect of us mere 'natives,' and if we tell the truth we are accused of being 'professionally jealous' of the 'proud position,' &c., if these gentlemen; so we will, for once, write a lie which shall be a 'whopper'—viz., Mr. Hammer's playing was magnificent! Without the slightest ill-feeling to the pianist, we assure him that he had better give up acting as if he thought the American public could be hoodwinked by printer's ink and lithography in the matter of piano-playing. Mr. S. B. Mills, Richard Hoffman, Gottschalk, and one or two more, have taught us too much for that. Mr. Hammer had better gather his portraits together again, and put them in pickle until he becomes a pianist—that is, if they will keep."

The New York Orpheonist thus warns a Professor of something or other not musical to respect the proverb "No suter," &c. The lesson has its application nearer home:—

"Prof. Comfort, of Princeton, has been assuring us that music is splendidly developed in this country, but that we have no grand buildings in which to preserve rusty pennies. The last may be true, but the first assertion we have to be false. The Professor's remarks were made at a meeting of the Union League Club, for the purpose of founding an Institute of Art, in which we do not believe any place would be found for a historic banjo, or a Revolutionary Jewsharp. We do not enjoy Prof. Comfort's acquaintance (rather he does not enjoy ours), but that we do not know whether or not he is jealous of music, but it is no new thing for scientific men in other departments to assume the belligerent attitude with relation to our art, although we think not a very honourable one. Prof. Comfort should not cry comfort when there is no comfort, or peace when there is no peace. Music is by no means well developed in our country. We wish these learned literary and statistical giants would let us alone and not bring us into their speeches as comparisons or metaphors. They never touch us without becoming ridiculous, from their ignorance of musical things and people. Dean Swift's abomination was music. Dicky Steel fired off his best pop-guns at music, and at Dr. Arne; and even 'the gentle Elia' lowered himself to the same amusement.

> 'Cannot a man live free and easy
> Without admiring Pergolese,' &c.

But all such things have not helped the poets much, while they have certainly hurt us less; and it is with feelings of profoundest respect and distinguished regard that we smile, smirk, shiver, and blush at being compelled to beg these intellectual pyramids most kindly and deferentially to—mount to—let us alone and mind their own business. Do we meddle with syntax, logarithms, and hexameters? Not we!"

The Pittsburgh Gazette tells of a strange dance of death:—

"A few evenings since a ball was held in one of the halls of the city, at which a large number of young folks were in attendance. Among the attractions was a prize, a gold ring, offered to the lady who should out-waltz all competitors. At twelve o'clock the band struck up 'Il Bacio,' and a dozen competitors took their places. At the expiration of twenty minutes four gave way leaving the rest twirling and whirling. One hour more, there were but two couples on the floor, and the dance went on till another hour had passed, another couple gave way leaving the remaining two pair of terpsichorean devotees. The band played and played and played, and the dancers danced and danced and danced, till even those who looked upon them grew sick and dizzy. At the end of the fourth hour the musicians grew feeble, and from the finger-ends of the violinists the blood trickled to the floor; but still they supplied the moving power to keep the dancers going. The excitement grew intense as the fifth hour came on, and there were those present who insisted on putting an end to the merry, though reckless suicide. However, no interference was permitted, and the prize dance over the jaws of death went on. After five hours had elapsed, one of the ladies fainted, her partner quickly followed her example, and, amid cheers, the prize was awarded to the couple that kept the floor. Then came a summing up of damages. The two contesting girls were nigher death than life, and had to be conveyed to their homes, together with their partners, who were as badly used, in carriages, and all have since been in a precarious condition. The girls had to have their shoes cut from their feet, and their limbs were swollen to an enormous size. The young men will hardly recover, and the musicians suffered terribly, and will never again play at a terpsichorean contest. So much for foolishness."

We add, hopefully, so much for fibbing.

"Does anyone require a new Quadrille? Let him straightway become the purchaser of either or both the above, which are, without any exception, the most stylish, the most dashing, and the prettiest we know. We cannot choose between them; one is as good as another—another as good as one."—The Queen.

OFFENBACH'S SIX NEW SONGS, published this day with English words, price 2s. each. Extract from review in The Queen, October 23rd:—

"Mr. Kenney has skilfully and tastefully adapted original words to these truly characteristic songs, so that the lovers of Offenbach may enjoy any one of them in the first drawing-room in the land, without fear of offence to the most fastidious. We have said the music is characteristic, and that it is without doubt; but it is something more—it is both fresh and genial, and for light, unpretending music, we know of nothing prettier.

"No. 1. LOVE AND POETRY, is a graceful song for a mezzo-soprano in E flat, in a sentimental style.

"No. 2. SOME OTHER DAY, is a gay and sparkling bolero in A flat for soprano, F the highest note.

"No. 3. OUTWARD BOUND, is simple to a degree, but withal charming; musical accompaniment alike being in good taste.

"No. 4. SEE YONDER BLOOMING ROSE, another song of the sentimental order, is for soprano; highest note G, and very elegant.

"No. 5. GENTLY GLIDES OUR SKIFF, a barcarole in F, the gem of the series, and as original a barcarole as we can call to mind. The song is perhaps best suited for a tenor; it is exceedingly vocal, and abounds in novel and piquant effects. If M. Offenbach had written nothing but this barcarole, we should still say that he is a very clever and original musician.

"No. 6. CUPID AND HYMEN, though less attractive than the other numbers, is not without merit, and will possibly please many, more than would better music."

The similarity between this beginning and that of the duet, "O namenlose Freude," in the first version of Leonora (1805), is obvious at a glance. For the sake of comparison, we give a few bars of this duet taken from an old manuscript, revised by the composer, and at present in the same library with the trio, on the first page of which stand the words, "alte oper," in Beethoven's handwriting. With this MS. agrees the vocal score of Leonora, edited by Otto Jahn, for Breitkopf and Härtel. The vocal score, published by the same firm in 1810, and now out of print, is taken from the second version of the opera (1806), in which the duet is altered and materially shortened from 213 to 124 bars.

The main subject, which in the first version recurs three times, here comes but twice; but at the beginning, for 50 bars or so, both versions agree pretty closely. In the third version, known as Fidelio, the alterations are made both at the beginning of the duet and in the chief subject, so that comparison is hardly possible.

It will be seen that, putting the accompaniment on one side, the principal themes are exactly alike in all the various respects of key, time, succession of keys, figures, motifs, &c., with the exception of one note. This is the first D given to the word "O," in the duet, which does not exist in the trio—a difference too trifling to alter the melody or to have any influence on the musical conditions of the piece. It is a mere metrical difference, occasioned by the text, and disappearing in the rhythm.

There is the same similarity in other particulars. Thus the motif, sung by Leonora and Florestan, first in half and then entire, although occurring in another position, and somewhat changed in form, will be found in the terzett to the words, "Gute Gotter, blickt herab."

Other differences, relating to the rhythm, and the relation of the music to the text, are most important. In the trio, the subject is only once repeated, and that by the voices; while, in the duet, it is repeated in turn by orchestra and voices, so as to come four times over, the voices pausing after and before the first time. In the trio this pause does not occur. There the lovers sing two verses without interruption, and are then silent for Porus. In the duet, Leonora and Florestan repeat the words, "O namenlose Freude," to the chief subject, and then part to reunite further on.

The trio, as a whole, is of more simple and primitive character than the duet. In the first part, all that follows the first solo of Porus is developed out of the preceding themes; while, in the duet, fresh themes and episodes are introduced. In the remainder of both pieces the thematic work of the first part is chiefly employed with a new idea here and there. The duet, however, is longer than the trio, in consequence of the great extension of its first portion. Both pieces are in Rondo form.

If from the form we pass to the musical spirit of the two pieces, there is no difficulty in giving the duet the preference. The emotion of joy lies at the base of each, but the expression of the emotion is more imaginative and forcible in the duet than the trio. The means of expression in the duet are so thoroughly suited to the words and the situation, that it is impossible to understand how they can have been equally well applied in the trio. Thus the pause which occurs after Leonora and Florestan have sung the words, "O namenlose Freude," for the first time, is certainly significant, and intended to express the breathless joy of the lovers. It is surely also appropriate to the situation that Leonora and Florestan should sing so few words, and repeat those they have already sung. Such emotion as theirs does not deal in many words—" the thoughts are too far from the lips."

Again the fermate which suddenly occurs at the word "lust," and the transition to a slower tempo, seem like points of rest and collectedness in the overpowering emotions of the lovers: but of such expression the trio shows nothing. The lovers there repeat none of the words which express their first outburst of pleasure. Porus sings a stanza of four uninterrupted lines, after which the lovers appear to forget their delight and implore the blessing of the gods. The piece does not contain a single pause, and the tempo with which it started rules throughout.

MUSIC IN VIENNA.

(From our original Correspondent.)

The reprise of Freischütz with new scenery and costumes is in preparation at the new operahouse for the beginning of January next. Finanzrath Baron Max von Weber, having accepted an invitation of Director Dingstedt, will come from Dresden to be present at the first performance of this very popular work of his immortal father.

The second abonnement-Concert, two Concerts of Frau Schumann, three Concerts of the florentin-quartett, and the annual performance of the Creation of Haydn, have been the best (more or less successful) musical entertainments of the last two weeks.

At the operahouse a beginner, Frl. Busse has made a very favourable impression as Contessa, in the Nozze di Figaro. This Lady is in possession of a very sympathetic mezzo-soprano, as well as of a good singing method. Her fina figure and Ladylike manners are quite suited to the part she chose for her début; but wanting pathos and istrionical power, I do not think that she will be so successful in other parts requiring more animation than that of the apathic countess.

The celebrated Wiener Mannergesangverein gave their first Concert this season on the 19th instant, bringing out on the occasion three novelties for chorus and orchestra, by the Herren Buck, Gernsheim, and Goldmark, which (perhaps with a little modification for the last named Gentleman) are just what the garman call "Machwerks," that is to say, made up without any inspiration, and endouvering to describe with orchestral and polyphonical effects the signification and sentiment of every word of the poem they have put in to music. The Desert of Félicien David was capitally rendered at the same Concert. The first concert this season, of the Orchesterverein, a society of first rate dilettanti, under the direction of Herr Heisler, took place on the 21st December, proving once more, that real amateurs can arrive through perseverance to excell in art. The Concert went on splendidly, and it gave opportunity to Frl. Carolina Schmerhofsky (the pupil of the Conservatoire of whom I spoke already in my last) to reveal her extraordinary talent and capital voice. She sang on this occasion a most beautiful, but extremely difficulty aria di bravura from the opera Le billet de loterie by Stonar (a gem nearly forgotten), and the amazement and enthusiasm of the public were so great, that after having recalled eight times the young songstress, they insisted upon calling forth her singing mistress, Mme. de Marchesi, who was obliged to bow from her seat, and thank the audience, among vociferouses applauses. Frl. Schmerhofsky, only seventeen years of age, is a very pretty girl, and in possession of every requisite to make a first rate singer. Let her learn two years more, and no doubt she will become a star of the greatest magnitude in the musical firmament. That is not only my own prognostic, but the opinion of the whole Viennese press in general, and the one expressed by Dr. Hanslick in the number 1909 (21st December) of the Neue Freie Presse.

The Direction of the Imperial Operahouse, having failed to find a Convinient substitute for Mlle. de Murska, is endeauvering to engage once more this celebrated Prima donna. En attendant, Mlle. de Murska is going to give a few performances here with abonnement suspendu previous to her departure for Paris. Her first appearance as Martha, on thursday last, was a grandious triumph from the beginning to the end of the opera, and the variations of Proch, which she sang at the end of the third act, brought the audience to the highest pitch of enthusiasm. Happy new year.

Vienna, 31st December. SALVATORE SAVERIO DI BALDASSARE.

THE LIBRETTO OF *DER FREISCHUTZ.

A short time before his death (on the 25th June, 1844), Friedrich Kind published at Leipsic a work entitled Das Freischützbuch, containing, besides the libretto of Der Freischütz, some curious details concerning the relations between Kind, and his collaborator, Carl Maria von Weber, from which we extract the following particulars:—

"Some time during the year 1816, Herr Schmiedel, Kammermusicus, called upon me, and brought with him a stranger dressed in black, and having a pale but clever face. Judging from his long arms, and his unusually developed hands, I at first took him for a pianist; it was Carl Maria von Weber. I was delighted at making his acquaintance; he had already a certain amount of reputation. He had set to music some popular songs, taken from those of Herder and Wunderhorn, of Körner and myself. This had flattered me all the more, as, up to then, I had never had any communication with him. I knew, moreover, that he was to have the post of chapel-master at Dresden.

"The conversation became animated; we spoke of a variety of subjects. At length, Weber said to me: 'You must write me an opera.' The proposal made me laugh. I had tried my hand at various kinds of composition, it is true, but the notion of writing a libretto had never entered my head. I rather liked the idea; besides, it is my firm conviction that nothing ought to be impossible for a poet. I frankly confessed to Weber that I scarcely knew my notes. He said that that would make no difference. 'It is settled; we shall understand one another; we will arrange the rest some other time!' We took leave of each other like two old friends.

"Weeks and months passed by; I had all sorts of work to do, but this did not cause me to renounce my project. I remembered that certain of my poems had been set to music, and proved successful; I remembered, too, having read, somewhere or other, that, by long study, the art of opera, tragedy not excepted, is capable of perfection. Lastly, Weber came and settled at Dresden, though I forget when.† He called and again spoke of my libretto. I at first affected unwillingness, but I did so like a girl who only desires to get married. I had often heard of the exacting disposition of composers, who look upon the opera merely from a musical point of view, and compel the author to introduce all sorts of modifications and alterations. I spoke out frankly to Weber on the subject. 'I will set your book,' he said, 'just as you send it in, of that I give you my word; as for details, which will require simply a stroke of the pen, you will, out of friendship for me, not refuse to change them.'

"The question was now to find a subject; I wanted a popular one, suited to Weber a peculiar kind of talent and my own. We looked through Musæus and Benedictus; collections of romances and of tales. At length we decided on Apel's Freischütz, but we afterwards gave it up. The censure was severe; the subject might be considered dangerous, as leading to propagate superstitious ideas. Besides, in Apel's story, the lovers die. This would not be allowed on the stage. All these difficulties discouraged us, and we parted without coming to any determination.

"But the notion had taken a firm hold of me; my heart beat high; I paced up and down my room, exciting my imagination with the fresh poetry of the forests and of popular legends. At length, the mists cleared away, and the dawn began to appear. That same evening, or the next morning very early, I ran off to Weber. 'I will do Freischütz for you. I will tackle the devil himself!' I go back; I will have nothing modern. We are living at the end of the Thirty Years' War, in the midst of the Forests of Bohemia. A pious hermit has appeared to us! The white rose is a protection against the Demon hunter! Innocence comes to the aid of the Strong one, when the latter is boasting; hell succumbs, and Heaven is triumphant!' I narrated my plot at length, and we flung ourselves in each others' arms, exclaiming; 'Long live our Freischütz!'"

M. Edmond Neukomm relates (History of Der Freischütz, Paris, A. Faure, 1867) how the two friends came to quarrel after the triumph achieved by their work at Berlin, on the 18th June, 1821:—

"Weber had only returned a short time to Dresden, when his recent joy was succeeded by a feeling of sorrow, caused by the susceptibility of his collaborator, Kind.

"Kind accused Weber of not having brought him sufficiently forward, and, in addition, with having used him merely for his own ends. It was in vain that Weber appealed to their old friendship, and reminded him of his letters immediately after the first representation of their work at Berlin. But nothing was of any avail. Quite the contrary: just as the success of Der Freischutz increased, the greater was the amount of dissatisfaction manifested by Kind, who, at length, gave full vent to his feelings. It was at the end of 1821. Der Freischutz had made its way triumphantly through all Germany; it had been represented simultaneously at every large theatre in that country. Its success had everywhere proved the same, immense and nearly unopposed; the work had, in consequence, brought in the sum of 1693 thalers to its author, in less than six months. Weber thought this was the time for making another attempt at reconciliation with his friend Kind. He wrote him a charming letter, one of those letters which he so well knew how to write, a letter which was dictated by the heart from beginning to end. Considering his embarrassed circumstances, Weber begged Kind to accept thirty ducats, a sum equal to that they had fixed for Kind's share, and which had been paid . . . . 'My dear fellow, allow me to slip this into your hand, and promise me you will lay it out in some way agreeable to yourself, and to your friends, so that I may see my sole object in sending it gratified, namely: a wish to please you.'

"But Kind was not in the slightest degree touched by Weber's delicacy. He returned the present, accompanied by a letter, in which he complains of composers, who purchase a poem dirt cheap, and then consider the business settled, while they continue to exhaust every one else, singers, machinists, choristers, and even lamp-men, to profit by the large sums the opera brings in. He summed up by saying that a person, worthy of belief, had stated that Count Brühl had sent 800 thalers for him, but that he had not seen a rapp. He returned, therefore, the thirty ducats to Weber, and looked upon the business as terminated. Weber kept his sorrow to himself, and said nothing."

REACTION.

(From the "New York Tribune.")

Two years ago, when half the town ran madly after her rollicking Highness of Gerolstein, and clapped their hands for joy that in the new French Apollo they had a greater god than any of the old Italians whose lays had charmed us before, a few sober people who had not been caught by the prevailing mania cried out that the musical art had got its death-blow, and we were all rushing to moral and æsthetic destruction. And it seemed indeed for a while as if they might be right. From the Grand Duchess to the Fair Helen was only one step, and from Troy to Brabant was another. The lofty levels of Offenbach's Parnassus and Parnassa at one end of Fourteenth Street, the faces of musicians grew sad and anxious at the other. Artists raised their voices in vain amid the solitudes of the Academy, while shapely women were flaunting their skirts and saying naughty things on the boards of the French Theatre. So the doors of the operahouse were locked one day, the cotton covers were drawn over the gilded boxes, and the dust was left to settle on the great stage until such time as the world should get through with its frolic and recover its senses. Mrs. Grant White and others might well know that art was departing for ever from the stage, and more nonsense and frivolity coming to permanently take its place. At last, however, the frolic became so daring that innocent eyes were opened to its real significance, and ladies found out that the fair Helen and the unhappy Genevieve were not very good company for them; and then the musical art had got its death-blow, but in opera bouffe, and such a marked change took place in the character of its patrons, that after the second season not a vestige of that style of entertainment was to be found in the whole city.

Then it was a serious question at first, however, whether the true art and the false had not both been overthrown. Very few supposed that musical taste would revive without at least a year or two of depression. But fashion is as fickle in music as she is in skirts and bonnets, and goes back as readily to a discarded composer as she does to an abandoned petticoat. We dare say that the great jubilee at Boston has had its effect in turning the public away from their false gods, and convincing them that they can worship with quite as much pleasure and quite as much style at the feet of Rossini as at the calves of Offenbach. We dare say that the recently held festival of singers must be ingratiate in the art of music. A seat at the Philharmonic concert is an unpurchasable luxury for which a New York belle would sacrifice the best ball of the season. The centenary of Beethoven is to be celebrated here with a grandeur which will make Boston blush with mortification and howl with envy. One English opera company has sung for us and gone away with full pockets, and another follows it with the same success. And finally, Italian opera, thought to be the most hopelessly prostrate of all lyric enterprises, basks in such a sunshine of favour that manager and singers must be amazed at their own prosperity. All these successes are well deserved, but they are not the less remarkable for all that. A good performance of William Tell is a blessing which descends upon America only once in a decade or so; and a performance with such an Arnold as the new tenor who had now fired the town would mark an epoch in the musical history of any city; yet music is so seldom rewarded as it should be that there is perhaps more reason to be surprised at the fashionable enthusiasm than if it wasted itself upon the dyed locks and stuffed anatomy of the ladies of the ballet. Frankly, we must say that fashion has shown a degree of sense for which we were quite unprepared.

IT OUGHT TO BE TRUE, IF IT IS NOT.—According to the Patrie Richard Wagner lately sent a copy of his Judaism in Music to Offenbach After reading what the "Musician of the Future" had to say about Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer, and other Jewish composers, Offenbach wrote as follows:—"My dear Wagner, I think you would do better to stick to music." On receiving this laconic epistle, Wagner forwarded Offenbach the score of Die Meistersinger. Two days later, Wagner received a second letter which ran thus:—"My dear Wagner, after mature reflection, I feel convinced that the best thing you can do is to confine yourself to writing books."

RETROSPECTIVE.

The musical history of 1869 is of a chequered character. In some respects, encouraging; in others, it gives little cause for congratulation. The question arises—On which side is the balance? We believe on the side of progress. In music, as in so many other things, one must look beneath the surface for a fair estimate of results. To those who do so, the fact is clear that right principles of art are making more and more way; that a greater power of appreciation is noticeable; and that musical education, amid a good deal which is absurd, or simply weak and futile, really goes on. But we have not so much to discuss the evidences of an advanced artistic taste, as to look back over the year 1869, and note what was done. Our survey can only take the form of a slight sketch, the filling up of which must be left to the refreshed memory of the reader.

Church music has continued to receive the attention which it still so sadly needs. That good results have been secured a very slight acquaintance with the matter proves. We are sorry to say, however, that these results are mainly confined to parish churches, the cathedrals participating in them little, if at all. The question of cathedral music reform has made hardly any visible progress during the year. There are still the glaringly bad arrangements which so long ago excited the wrath of men who felt that cathedral churches should be an ensample to all others. The singers are still underpaid, and, as a consequence, often inefficient. Moreover, they are still too few for the purposes they pretend to serve; while the music used calls loudly for change from feeble twaddle or contrapuntal inanity, to that which shall stir devotional feeling in the hearts of worshippers, and be worthy the service and place with which it is connected. But while all these things continue, public opinion has ripened for reform. Many parish churches have shot ahead of the cathedrals and shame them by contrast. There only remains for some authoritative hand to work upon the latter in the direction of an efficient musical service. From the comfortable nests wherein repose comfortable dignitaries protests might be heard; but the world outside would have to note a like impotence in the acquiescence. An improvement in one department of church music has attracted much attention during the year. We refer to the healthy reaction in favour of genuine organ music, as against the bastard stuff known by the name of "arrangements." Some regular and adequate test of fitness have appeared, lacks nothing of force and completeness. How much good it is certain to effect, both as regards encouragement to a branch of musical composition, and improvement in a department of executive art, need not here be stated. By-and-bye, perhaps, we shall have to note a like improvement in the taste with which organists use their instrument during divine service. In many cases, just now, we see the augmented resources of the organ made a nuisance by the way they are used. A change for the better depends, we fear, upon the establishment of some regular and adequate test of fitness for an organist's work. If this be really the case, improvement may come with the Greek Kalends! hardly before.

Concerts of sacred music were not too numerous during the past year. Such as took place, however, proved, on the whole, interesting. A very important feature was the establishment of Mr. Barnby's Oratorio Concerts, and the appearance of a prospectus which went beyond the range of half a-dozen familiar works. Mr. Barnby's production of Jephtha in the spring, and recently of Acis and the Impiegato, with Mendelssohn's accompaniments, were events of more than ordinary importance, not only for their own sake, but also for their stimulating effect upon other societies. The latter result is evident. Early in the year, for example, the Sacred Harmonic Society moved its huge bulk in the bringing forth of Mendelssohn's Lauda Sion, and now in the same composer's psalms. We have since had Deborah; and expect soon the great Mass in D of Beethoven. Upon the National Choral Society good example has had a less apparent influence. Whether this result from a spirit of resistance or a feeling of weakness is a question not to be decided here. The two festivals of 1869, held at Norwich and Worcester, need be recalled only for the sake of an allusion to Mr. Pierson's Hezekiah at the former town, and Mr. Sullivan's Prodigal Son at the latter. Hezekiah threatened to be a source of woe, but expiation speedily died out; and as it is a good prospect for 1870 that nothing further is said about getting up a performance of the oratorio in London. The success of Mr. Sullivan's work at the Crystal Palace is an event so recent that bare allusion to it will suffice.

Orchestral concerts were numerous enough in 1869, and their number may be regarded as a favourable sign. How the Philharmonic Society popularized itself by reduced prices and a removal to St. James's Hall; and how it gave better performances of capital music, everybody remembers. It should also be borne in mind that the programmes were not deficient in novelty; and that, generally, the old society made an earnest effort to accommodate itself to new conditions. The New Philharmonic ran its venerable rival hard, and Dr. Wylde's season was noticeable for the production of several works of interest, such as Herr Hiller's pianoforte concerto in C, and Cherubini's overture, Zu Portugiesche Gasthof. So much attention is deservedly paid in these columns to the Crystal Palace Saturday Concerts, that we need only indicate in as few words as possible, how well their reputation was sustained during 1869. Other musical doings at the Crystal Palace have been legion. The Rosolni Festival; the summer concerts (with a larger infusion of the classical element); the great gatherings of children; and, last of all in every sense, the Tonic Sol-fa monstrosity in imitation of Boston—these secured to Palace frequenters a round of musical entertainments from the beginning of the year to its end. Among the other orchestral concerts given were those conducted by Mr. Henry Leslie (to whom the public are indebted for a hearing of much interesting music) and the few which an unkind fate permitted Mr. Hargitt to conduct at Holborn Amphitheatre.

Concerts of chamber music have been mainly confined to well established institutions, with the "Monday Populars" at their head. Mr. Arthur Chappell never entered more successfully for his public than during 1869. How, in the early months, he produced novelty after novelty, and how, at late, he brought forward the distinguished violinist, Madame Néruda, are well remembered facts. They are, moreover, facts doubly pleasant to contemplate, because showing that, after ten years of existence, the "Pops" are as vigorous as ever; with a promise of long life about them, affording a guarantee of abundant future pleasure. Among other concerts of note must be mentioned the unique pianoforte recitals given by Madame Arabella Goddard; recitals, the importance of which, like the transcendant ability which carried them through with success, hardly obtained sufficient recognition. Mr. Hallé's recitals presented nothing new, and can be passed with simple mention; while the concerts given in Mdlle. Nilsson's name at Exeter Hall, have been very recent subjects for comment.

Turning now to opera, we have to note a futile attempt at coalition and monopoly. As was readily foreseen, and confidently foretold, the Gye-Mapleson alliance proved every way hurtful. No good came of it to art or to the public, because the managers could profit by monopoly, with a minimum of exertion on their part. Hence the reason was, in a musical sense, the worst ever known. Of course such a state of things could not last, and the year just commenced will witness a rivalry out of which, whatever may happen to the rivals, gain will come to the public. In these remarks we have paid no heed to the miserable business at the Lyceum, which only resulted in annoyance and injury to a number of respectable artists. English opera, so long out in the cold, found a home, or, rather homes, in 1869. Aida and Galatea was brought out at the Princess's Theatre with a completeness which the manager has since, perhaps, regretted; and, at the Crystal Palace, Mr. George Perren carried on a series of performances which obtained much favour. As these are to be resumed we still indulge a hope that they may prove the beginning of better things. All circumstances favour this result. The appliances are to hand, artists might readily be found, an admirable orchestra is on the spot, and possible failure does not mean possible ruin. If such circumstances are not duly taken advantage of, the fault will be serious, and the consequence unfortunate.

In the midst of all this work death has not been idle. Berlioz, Meliqne, and Grisi, each illustrious in the world of music, have departed from us, in company with a host of others less known. Nor has this loss been balanced. We still wait the "coming man" who is to show us that musical genius has not gone back to heaven. Will he come in 1870?

THADDEUS EGG.

ARABELLA GODDARD AT GREENOCK.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—In your notice of Madame Goddard's concert the attendance is attributed "to the very boisterous weather," which I hardly think quite correct, as, though the stormy night had a good deal to do with it, the main cause of the failure of such entertainments in a pecuniary sense is attributable to the existence of a feeling among our townspeople of what I cannot describe by a better term than "caste," which unfortunately keeps many from availing themselves of the opportunities of hearing good music. Simply because they cannot afford to pay for the first seats they prefer punishing themselves and their families by staying at home, fearing that if seen in second seats they would be voted mean and shabby by friends sure to be found in the front. At the annual choral concert, with its free tickets, people are seen in area and gallery who will tell you that they would not go there for the world at a "pay" concert; so that gentility appears to consist of the cost of admission to an entertainment: and until this absurd notion is got rid of I fear that, as hitherto, there will be the same account to give of all the high class and high-priced entertainments in town. A CONCERT-GOER.

ANGOULEME.—A tragical event happened at the Alcazar in this town, a short time since. In consequence of an altercation with the proprietress of that establishment, the prompter, drawing out a pistol, shot her dead. As she fell to the ground, the poor creature exclaimed, "Avenge me! I am dead!" On hearing the report of the pistol followed by the above words, the master-carpenter rushed up. He asked the assassin how he could commit such a fearful act, when the latter fired off a second pistol, aimed at the unfortunate carpenter. "If that is not enough for you, I will let you have another charge," said the murderer as he fired. But it was enough! the poor carpenter fell down dead, without uttering a word. The prompter was seized and carried off to the prison of St. Roch.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 15, 1870.

A HOT BATH.

IT is not often that Bath has to be spoken of in musical journals. That city of the past is chiefly connected with buns, chaps, Beau Nash, Mr. Samuel Weller's immortal "swarry," and half-pay gentility of a gone-to-seed description. If we were asked to describe Bath in few words, we should say that it combined the gentle sadness which comes of looking on monuments of departed glory with the fierce excitement of competitive lodging-letting to scarce lodgers. The idea of Bath distinguishing itself in music under such circumstances is scarcely reasonable. Its harp must be hung on the willows by the banks of Avon; and all its faculties must be engrossed by the bill in the window. Nevertheless, Bath has distinguished itself. It went to hear the Messiah on New Year's Eve, and behaved in the manner following. Mr. Sims—but, no; the Bath and Cheltenham Gazette shall tell the story:—

"Anxiety is generally felt as to the appearance of the favourite tenor, Mr. Sims Reeves. But, after the announcements that he had 'arrived' in the city, all anxiety was allayed, and a crowded attendance was the re-sult. The overture finished, 'And the glory,' was essayed, and proceeded with through angry and loud marks of disapproval at the non-appearance of Mr. Sims Reeves. The Messiah without 'Comfort ye' and 'Every valley' is like Hamlet without the Prince of Denmark; and surely if such an omission was intended, a few words of explanation were required. Had it been stated previous to the commencement of the overture that Mr. Reeves was present, but suffering from such indisposition as to be obliged to ask for the indulgence of the audience, in not singing all set down for him, then the unnecessary demonstration, so much out of place in a sacred performance, would have been spared. It is not our duty to blame any one in particular for this omission. We have simply to record the proceedings, which must have been particularly painful to those who were interested in the matter.

"After the chorus, 'And the Glory,' not a note of which was heard to anything like advantage through the interruptions, Mr. Thomas rose to sing the recit, 'Thus saith the Lord,' when he was assailed by hisses from all parts of the room. Mr. Thomas treated this mark of disrespect (which we can assure Mr. Thomas was not intended personally) very cavalierly, and, notwithstanding, essayed two or three times to execute his part. But the audience would not have it. At last the explanation required at the first was given, from which we learned that Mr. Sims Reeves was unable to sing the complete tenor rôle. After that the performance proceeded, but it was evident great dissatisfaction was felt."

Pigs of Prince Bladud!—here was a pretty row! What had come to Bath? Had it indulged in plum-pudding, to the injury of its digestion? or were the lodgers chary of Christmas boxes? Perhaps it had drank largely of "mountain port" and "Hambro' sherry." Something must have happened to bring about such a cataclysm. Stay!—in the Bath Chronicle we see a letter from "One of the Audience," which clears up the whole matter. It was not plum-pudding, nor conspicuously absent Christmas-boxes; it was not "Cape" port, nor North German sherry, but a notion that singers are fair game to be shot at and hunted at will. "One of the Audience" talks about "these male singers" and their "affected snobbishness" (we should imagine him a competent judge of the real article), he calls Messrs. Reeves and Thomas "these people," and hopes that should either "visit Bath again, that the people will show their appreciation of their conduct by giving them an empty room." Finally,—"One of the Audience" declares with all the horror of a gentleman's gentleman, in presence of a disrespectful "Buttons," that Mr. Thomas came on to sing "Why do the nations?" "without his gloves"!!! Mr. Thomas, how could you? You, a native of Bath, ought, of all men, to know that Bath, though born of Prince Bladud's pigs, was nourished by gentility. Have you never read Pickwick, and never inwardly digested the polite epistle of the Bath footmen therein contained? Has it never dawned upon your benighted mind that Bath looks down from an immeasureable height upon "male singers" like yourself, and regards them as only fit for kicking or patting, according to the whim of the moment. How dare you, sir, in presence of the people once ruled by Beau Nash, pretend to have any feelings? But you are wiser now; and so, doubtless, is Mr. Reeves. When next our eminent tenor—for he is eminent among "these people"—goes to Bath he will no more venture to be indisposed than you will venture to appear gloveless. Both of you, in short, will stand up and meekly receive whatever insults half-pay gentility and its landlordism may choose to heap upon you.

Seriously, the whole matter is a disgrace to Bath. The audience can only point to one extenuating circumstance:—the non-explanation of Mr. Reeves's absence. But for that Mr. Bianchi Taylor, or whoever had charge of the concert, was to blame; and, in any case, the persistent hissing down of Mr. Thomas was a gross insult to an artist who had done nothing whatever to deserve such treatment. It is of small use to say that the hissing was not meant for Mr. Thomas personally. When, flinging at No. 1, you must hit No. 2 also, the latter will hardly be appeased by declaring that he was not the target. As regards absence from the platform, we may observe that singers do not let themselves out to be stared at but to be heard; and that when conductors omit to allow an advertised interval the consequences should be on their own head. To sum up the whole matter, we hope that artists will put a black mark against Bath, and leave it to decay and its own bad passions.

NATIONAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

Elijah was given by this Society on Wednesday evening, under the direction of Mr. G. W. Martin. The soloists were Madame Rinderdorff, Miss Palmer, Mr. G. Perren, and Mr. Renwick, all of whom acquitted themselves well; more particularly Madame Rudderdorff, who was much applauded after "Hear ye, Israel," and Mr. Perren, whose success was made in "If with all your hearts." The band was efficient to a more than usual degree, and the chorus, though less numerous than on former occasions, exerted themselves satisfactorily.

Among the arrangements for the Hereford Festival in August next, are the following:—Engagements have been accepted by Mdlle. Tietjens, Mr. Lewis Thomas, and Mr. Santley, and it is hoped that the assistance either of Mdlle. Nilsson or Madame Patti may be secured. The works already selected include Mendelssohn's unfinished Christus, Spohr's Last Judgment, and Sullivan's Prodigal Son. A novelty in the scheme will be a performance of the Reformation Symphony in the cathedral. Mr. Townshend Smith, we have the honour to salute you.

Leipsic.—Mdlle. Therese Schneider, of Berlin, lately appeared very successfully as the heroine of Cherubini's Medea.

Brussels.—M. Boger has been "starring" at the Théâtre de la Monnaie.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

Herr Carl Hause's concert in the Hanover Square Rooms on the 6th inst. was one of special attraction. The instrumental works played were Hummel's trio in E flat for piano (Herr Hause), violin (Herr Ludwig), and violoncello (Signor Piatti); an introduction and Polonaise by Chopin for piano and violoncello; two movements from the Kreutzer Sonata, and three of Herr Hause's pianoforte solos. All these selections were more or less well rendered, and more or less well received by a large audience. The vocalists were Madame Bauermeister and Mr. Santley. The latter gave Herr Hause's song, "A Mother's Smile" with immense effect, and had to submit to an encore. He also sang Balfe's "I love you." Madame Bauermeister's two songs were both composed by Herr Hause.

Thursday, the 6th inst., being an open night at the Royal Artillery Mess, Woolwich, Sir Michael Costa came as the guest of Colonel Clerk, and the following programme was performed by the full orchestra of the Royal Artillery, consisting of 70 performers, under the directions of Mr. J. Smyth, bandmaster:—

"Overture, Meerestille, Mendelssohn; Grand Selection from Naaman, Sir M. Costa; Andante con moto, from Symphony in B minor, Schubert; Operatic Selection, Il Barbiere, Rossini; Grand March, Naaman, Sir M. Costa."

After the performance Sir Michael Costa sent for the director, Mr. Smyth, and expressed his gratification at the manner in which the selections from his oratorio had been performed. Sir Michael had previously presented a full score of the work to Mr. Smyth, as a testimonial of his esteem for that gentleman's ability, which has afforded so much gratification to the members of the band and the officers of the corps.

An operatic and dramatic performance was given at the Cavendish Rooms on Thursday the 6th inst. before a crowded and fashionable audience, the pieces represented being Miss Virginia Gabriel's operetta, Widows Bewitched, and Delicate Ground, by Mr. Charles David. The operetta was efficiently sustained by Miss A. Buckland and Miss Palmer (the eminent contralto), Mr. W. Shakespeare, and Mr. John Gill. The Dioner-scene and the duet at the end created roars of laughter. After this, Mr. George Buckland sang one of his bufo songs; and the comedietta of Delicate Ground was well played, by Miss Palmer as Pauline, Mr. John Gill as Citizen Sangfroid, and Mr. Poole as Alphonse. The performance, under the direction of Mrs. Roberts (Miss Rebecca Isaacs) appeared to give entire satisfaction, the only drawback being the lateness of the hour at which it terminated.

Dresden.—A performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis was lately given in the Kreuz-kirche, in aid of the Pension Fund of the chorus at the Theatre Royal.

Cologne.—At the sixth Gewandhaus Concert, the prelude to Herr R. Wagner's Meistersinger von Nuremberg was performed for the first time here. In all probability, it will not be encored, for it was evident that the Cologne public is not yet advanced enough to appreciate Herr Wagner's transcendental effusions! At the same concert the fugue from Beethoven's C major Quartet was given with 32 violins, 10 tenors, 12 violoncellos, and 9 double-basses; but the experiment did not prove a success.

Cassel.—Herr Heinrich Schulze's "grand romantic opera," Die Rosatrappe, has been at length produced, and—not proved a success. The composer calls himself the Rector of the Conservatory of Music in this town. Referring to this fact, the correspondent of the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung says:—"Is there such a thing as a Conservatory of Music here? As far as we are aware, no musician in the place has had anything to do with such an institution; there was merely a pompous announcement inserted last year in the papers by Herr Schulze, to the effect that the most eminent local artists were to be engaged as professors. Since, now, without the co-operation of such artists, or that of artists summoned for the purpose from elsewhere, there can be no Conservatory of Music in the place, the conviction forced itself justly, as we think, upon us, that the grand staff of professors exists only in the imagination of Herr Schulze, and is represented wholly and solely by himself. That, under the circumstances, there is no such thing as a Conservatory of Music in Cassel—though there is a great deal of talk in papers published elsewhere about one—is a fact that must be clear to anyone, even though he be not a musician. We were still more strengthened in our opinion by the representation of Die Rosatrappe, which we would fain be excused from criticizing, because it is beneath criticism.

If this performance is to be taken as a specimen of what the Conservatory of Music can do, the public will be able to form a correct idea of that institution, seeing that its founder, conductor, professor, &c., has pronounced his own condemnation." The above is "vaide !" as M. A. Dumas, junr., makes one of his characters exclaim. What will Herr Schulze have to say in reply?

PROVINCIAL.

THE WEST LONDON CHORAL SOCIETY gave a performance of Elijah at St. George's Hall, on Wednesday, December 22nd, which was largely attended. The principal vocalists were—Madame Florence Lancia, Madame Levesque, Mr. Wallace Wells, and Mr. Ralph Wilkinson. Madame Lancia was in good voice, and sang her music with great care. Mr. Wilkinson gave the music of the "Prophet" with considerable discretion and power. The other solos were effectively sustained; and Misses Scott and Pond, Messrs. Perry and Kilbey were successful in the second quartet. The band of 70, which has amongst its members some of the principal amateurs of the day, played very carefully. The chorus of 300 was successful throughout, especially in "Thanks be to God," "He watching over Israel," and "Be not afraid." The performance reflects the highest credit on the able conductor, Mr. William Beavan.

LEEDS.—Dr. Spark's organ recital, at the Town Hall, on Tuesday last, was one of much interest. The programme included several selections from the last part of the Organist's Quarterly Journal; among them being Silas's "Melody," Smart's "Postlude," and the two pieces by Batiste. There were also, in the scheme, Bach's Grand Fugue in C minor, and the finale to Macfarren's Organ Sonata.

LENTON.—A correspondent says:—

"A concert of an interesting character took place at the village of Lenton, near Nottingham, on the 7th of January, for the benefit of the poor, and the result was a great success; the room being crowded, and the audience delighted. The concert was originated by Mr. Henry Farmer (who lives in the village), and reflects the greatest credit upon all concerned. This is the third time Mr. Farmer has given similar concerts with a good result. At the last about eighty old people received, from his hands, 6s. each. The profit this time will amount to £40."

SHEFFIELD.—The Sheffield Daily Telegraph, of Jan. 7th, says:—

"Last evening, Dr. Spark gave a lecture on music for the benefit of the Mechanics' Institution, illustrated by compositions of Handel, Haydn, Mozart, and Mendelssohn. He was assisted by Miss Winder, Miss Annie Anyon, and Mr. G. H. Rushworth. The lecturer presided at the pianoforte. Dr. Spark gave a brief outline of the career of Handel, and opened the musical portion of the entertainment by introducing Miss Winder, who rendered various airs from the Messiah. Dr. Spark played the overture to Samson. 'With verdure clad' was selected from Haydn's works. Miss Winder sang the melody with great sweetness. Mr. Rushworth sang 'Honour and Arms' (Handel), and 'Oh Lord, I have laboured' (Mendelssohn). The remainder of the selections were secular, the following: 'Leave me, deceiver,' from Handel's Rinaldo. 'The Harmonious Blacksmith' followed. Miss Winder sang Haydn's 'Mermaid's Cave,' and received a merited encore. The next song by Mr. Rushworth, 'Sir Page,' from Figaro, was also encored. Miss Winder and Miss Anyon sang at the conclusion duets by Mozart and Mendelssohn."

A CORRESPONDENT from Sheffield writes as follows:—

"The last of Mr. Freemantle's sub-criptions concerts in the Music Hall, was well attended. The Anemoic Union (Mr. Henry Nicholson, Mr. Lazarus, Mr. Charles Harper, &c. &c., Mr. William Shakespeare, conductor) assisted and justified the eulogies of the provincial press. Mrs. Thaddeus Wells gave some ballads with genuine feeling. The instrumental solos included one for oboe (Mr. Crozier), one for clarionet (Mr. Lazarus), one for bassoon (Mr. Wootten), and two for pianoforte, by Mr. Shakespeare (Liszt's Rigoletto, and a Rondo by Mendelssohn), in both of which proved himself a master of his means. A quintet by Beethoven was remarkably well played by the members of the Anemoic Union, and Mr. Freemantle deserves the thanks of all amateurs for so admirable a concert."

WATERFORD.—The Waterford Mirror, of December 29th, speaks thus respecting the Harmonic Society's second concert:—

"The continuation of the first concert of this society took place on Wednesday night, before a very large audience, in the Assembly Rooms, City Hall. As our readers know the tempestuous weather last week prevented the arrival of the London artists, but the committee took advantage of their subsequent presence in Limerick, to renew the engagement. The vocalists were—Ildille. Marie Stocken, Miss Geraldine Somers, Mr. Charles Stanton, Miss Kate Gordon, and Mr. Joseph Bilton, who officiated as conductor, whilst Mr. Tiffin, Waterford Artillery, led the orchestra. In Guglielmo's 'Echo Song,' Miss Stocken was admirable. Miss Stanton displayed much talent in 'Stride la Vampa,' Offenbach's 'I'm an Alsatian' (Mdlle. Stocken and Mr. C. Stanton), which had to be repeated. Mr. Stanton acquitted himself admirably in his songs. Miss Somers accompanied herself in Macfarren's 'Late, so late,' and had to follow it with 'Home, sweet Home,' retiring amid enthusiastic plaudits. Miss Gordon played selections from some of our first masters, in highly creditable style. The orchestra acquitted itself to satisfaction."

MADAME SAINTON'S CONCERT.

On Friday evening Madame Sainton-Dolby gave, in St. James's Hall, the first of two concerts, which are all that "will be given by her in London prior to her final farewell of the public in June next." The occasion was interesting, therefore; and, the programme being attractive, it must be assumed that only the wretchedest of the many wretched evenings we have had lately prevented the room from being crowded in every part. But, in any case, there can be as little doubt of the esteem in which Madame Sainton-Dolby is held, as of the regret with which music lovers will part with one who has so long and oft delighted them. The programme was rich and various, aiming to satisfy both classical and popular tastes. Among the higher order of works selected was Beethoven's Kreutzer Sonata, in which M. Sainton (who appears as a soloist less often than he should) was associated with Miss Agnes Zimmermann. Both artists played their best—that is to say, they played very well indeed, and held the attention of a miscellaneous audience to the last bar. M. Sainton also performed Wallace's fantasia on "The Last Rose of Summer" in admirable style, as did Miss Zimmermann Benedict-Tracy-transcription of "Where the bee sucks," and two smaller pieces. Many of the songs were of interest. Madame Sainton-Dolby, for example, gave Haydn's "Spirit Song;" "Vineta," a new composition by Henry Smart; and Purcell's "Full Fathom Five," obtained for the latter an imperative encore. She also appeared with success as a composer, her effective and decidedly original "Bridal Song" (charmingly given by Mr. W. H. Cummings) being among the "repeats" of the evening. Other pieces which attracted notice included "Cease your tunning," song for Madame Rita with much ability, and encored; Handegger's new "Christmas Bells," in which Mr. Lewis Thomas did ample justice; and Blumenthal's "The days that are no more," sung (twice) by Mr. Byron. The concerted vocal music was given by Mr. Barnby's excellent choir. That gentleman's carol, "Holy night," obtained a deserved encore; and Sullivan's "Hush thee, my babie," as well as Reay's "Dawn of day," had a not less good rendering. A "Noel," by Gounod, lately referred to in our reviewing columns, was in the programme, and its effect, as sung by Madame and M. Sainton, and choir, fully sustained the opinion we expressed about it. The concert was, unfortunately, deprived of Miss Edith Wynne's services by illness. Mr. Thouless conducted.

SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS.

Saturday, the most unmusical day in the week, is gradually assuming a new character. A little while ago concert-givers never took it into their schemes, but gave it up to theatres and exhibitions, which have unquestionably made a good thing of the monopoly. Why the day was supposed to be one of ill-omen for music is hard to tell, and probably those most concerned had no further reason for regard to it than that of custom. How the Crystal Palace managers violated this custom to the public advantage and their own is matter of history. The "Saturday Concerts," directed by Mr. Manns, have made Saturday a mount in music that we wonder the example was not followed long ago. It has been followed at length, however; and a series of orchestral and vocal entertainments, directed by Mr. George Wood, began last Saturday evening, in Exeter Hall. There is no reason whatever why the enterprise should not be successful; and there is every inducement to wish it so, because the want of popular orchestral concerts is great, and their non-supply a serious deficiency.

Mr. Wood has started his scheme under favourable conditions. The hall is large enough to make "popular prices" remunerative; artists of the highest standing are at command; and, judging by the first programme, the director has a nearly accurate notion of what to put before his public. His notion is not quite accurate, perhaps, because he appears to think that one specimen of dance music may be acceptable. In this, we think, he is mistaken. Those who are attracted by the staple of his programme are not likely to hear dance music with much patience. We are encouraged to hope that Mr. Wood will withdraw these pieces. In the first programme a waltz had the place of honour; in the second it is properly degraded to the task of playing the audience in; from the third, perhaps, it will be expelled altogether.

The orchestral works performed on Saturday, under the painstaking direction of Mr. Henry Leslie, were three—each in its way a masterpiece. First came Haydn's well-known Symphony in G (letter O), to which an efficient orchestra, led by Mr. Weist Hill, did justice. The second work was Mendelssohn's pianoforte concerto in D minor; the solo instrument confided to Miss Agnes Zimmermann. So familiar a composition, one which every amateur knows and loves, requires no comment from us, and it is only necessary to say that Miss Zimmermann acquitted herself well of a formidable task. Her execution of the elaborate difficulties in the allegro and presto was marked both by fluency and precision; while the sadness of the adagio was happily expressed. The fair pianist deserved her recall. Last of the orchestral selections came the overture to Oberon, which was played, though last in the programme, to an attentive audience. Besides the concerto, Miss Zimmermann gave two little pieces by Stephen Heller.

The vocal music calls only for simple mention. Mdme. Sinico gave "Qui la voce" and a new song by Henry Smart, "The birds were telling one another," the latter encored. Signor Foli contributed a scena by Bordese, "David singing before Saul," and was encored in Beyloff's "Over the Rolling Sea," and Mr. Santley delighted his audience by a perfect delivery of Donizetti's "O Lisbona," "O Ruddier than the Cherry," and, in response to an encore, Arditi's capital "Stirrup Cup."

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

(From the "Daily News.")

These excellent entertainments were resumed on Monday night, when Herr Straus and Madame Arabella Goddard appeared as leading violinist and solo pianist, both for the first time during the present season. The programme was as follows:—

PART I.

Quartet, in F, No. 1, Op. 18 ...	...	...	...	Beethoven.
Song, "O cessate di piegarmi" ...	...	...	...	Scarlatti.
Fantasia, in A, Pianoforte ...	...	...	...	Friedemann Bach.

PART II.

Sonata (in D major, Op. 58) Pianoforte and Violoncello				Mendelssohn.
Songs, "Eloge larmes." "Hark, hark, the lark"			...	Schubert.
Septet, in E flat, Op. 20 ...	...	...	...	Beethoven.

Beethoven's quartet, the first in his grand series of seventeen, belongs to that period of the composer's career (1798-1800) when he was under the influence of Mozart. To this date also belongs the septet, which still remains, and is likely ever to remain, the finest work of its kind. Among the curiosities of musical history is the recorded alteration of Beethoven's opinion of this work—at first highly prized by him (as shown by his several arrangements of it in other forms) and afterwards so unjustly depreciated when his genius developed into that vast region of the abstract and sublime that passes beyond the confines of constructive rules. As neither of the works referred to are new, to readers or to Monday Popular Concert audiences, it will be sufficient now to say that they were again admirably played at this concert; the leading violin sustained by Herr Straus with his usual excellence of tone, style, and mechanism. His coadjutors in the string quartet were Mr. Zerbini (viola), and Signor Piatti (violoncello)—all of whom were warmly welcomed on their re-appearance in their accustomed places. These artists were associated in the septet with M. Papé (clarionet), M. Wendtland (horn), Mr. Hutchings (bassoon), and Mr. Reynolds (contrabass), whose excellence has before been proved here in the same music. Mdme. Arabella Goddard's first entry was received with a loud and general tribute of applause from an audience which was evidently mindful of her long and frequent association with these concerts, and with the great works there interpreted. The speciality of the evening, as to novelty, was the Fantasia of Wilhelm Friedemann Bach—a piece which, we believe, has only once before been played in public in London, at one of Madame Goddard's recitals in June last. Friedemann Bach was the eldest of the many sons of Sebastian, most of whom were celebrated as musicians, the most so having been Carl Philip Emanuel, the second son Friedemann, however, was probably the greater genius of the two, judging by those of his works which are extant, but a small portion of which were published recently. His eccentric and indolent habits alone prevented him from obtaining that recognition to which he was unquestionably entitled. While his organ music presents more of analogy to that of his great father than that of any of the other sons, it must be conceded that Emanuel has exercised more lasting influence on pianoforte music, by a change of style which prepared the way for that soon afterwards developed by Haydn; being, in fact, the foundation of the modern school. The Fantasia of Friedemann Bach, now referred to, consists of four movements; an introductory kind of prelude, full of bravura passages and rapid arpeggios; a graceful allegretto in E minor, in which there is little trace of the antique; a quaint moderato in A minor; and a final rondo in A major, in which again there is a large approximation to the modern school. The few specimens of this composer hitherto published have been chiefly compositions for the organ, on which he was one of the greatest performers of his day. From the examples of his music for the pianoforte (or rather for the instruments which preceded the pianoforte) it would seem that with more activity of character, he would have exercised at least as great a contemporary influence as his brother Emanuel. The beauty and power of each movement of the Fantasia referred to, were fully appreciated in Monday night's performance; which it is scarcely necessary to say was of high excellence. The crispness of touch, certainty of execution, alternate power and delicacy of Madame Goddard's playing were beyond all praise, and the executant and the work were received with marked approval. The Fantasia is just published by Duncan Davison & Co., of Regent Street, and forms the first number of a projected series (edited by J. W. Davison), under the title of "Revivals," which is to "consist of pieces hitherto only existing in manuscript, or which have been out of print." In these days of growing interest in the music of the past, such a collection cannot fail to be of the highest interest. Often as Madame Goddard has played here and elsewhere, Mendelssohn's fine second duet sonata, she has never given it with greater brilliancy and impulse than on this occasion, when its performance, enhanced by the splendid tone and style of Signor Piatti, produced one of the chief effects of the evening. Mr. Santley was the vocalist, which should be tantamount to saying that the songs were given to perfection. The grace and pathos of the old aria of Scarlatti, and its refined and finished execution, called forth a universal encore, which was replied to by a repetition of the second verse. Mr. Benedict was in his usual place as accompanist; and how valuable and important his co-operation is every one knows. The great room of St. James's Hall was crowded in every part.

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

With reference to Friedemann Bach's Fantasia at the Monday Popular Concerts, the Pall Mall Gazette says:—

"The pianoforte solo was the Grand Fantasia by W. Friedemann Bach, which attracted so much attention at Madame Arabella Goddard's recitals last season. Of course, it was played on this occasion by the lady who first introduced it—as she has introduced so many others—to public notice. Of the Fantasia itself, now just published, we shall have another opportunity of speaking. Enough for the present that the verdict of last season's audience was confirmed, and that the work must be regarded as a curious example of anticipation, by an almost forgotten composer, of what we are pleased to consider modern effects. Madame Goddard played the Fantasia in her very best style—that is to say, nothing was wanting in execution or expression. A more perfect rendering of unfamiliar music cannot be imagined; and the audience recognized its merit by a specially hearty recall."

The Daily Telegraph has the following exordium to an article on Mr. Boosey's Ballad Concerts:—

"Mr. John Boosey has just commenced a short series of the Ballad Concerts, which have been found so attractive during several past winter seasons. He has found out that there are very many people who appreciate a simple ballad, well sung, far more than all the classical music ever composed; and he has turned his discovery to good account. Whatever vanity there may be in tastes, there is no doubt that 'whatever is worth doing at all is worth doing well;' and Mr. Boosey takes care that his ballads shall be rendered by the most competent available artists."

The exordium to the Pall Mall Gazette's notice of the same concerts ran thus:—

"The fourth season of these concerts began on Wednesday night, in St. James's Hall, under Mr. John Boosey's direction. A good deal has been said against the entertainment Mr. Boosey offers; some even going so far as to urge that it is harmful, because encouraging a taste for trashy music. This, however, is as it may be. All ballads are not worthless; and many have as legitimate a right to be heard as anything can have which belongs to a higher order of art. From another point of view, we can imagine the giving of ballad concerts as a department of practical philanthropy. Few entertainments appear to confer so much innocent and hearty pleasure. St. James's Hall on Wednesday, for example, was crowded with people of every degree, who sat out a programme thirty-one pieces long, not only with patience, but with demonstrative enjoyment. A sight of that audience when Mr. Santley was declaiming 'Hearts of Oak,' or Madame Sherrington giving, with all her distinctive expression, 'The Harp that once,' might have formed part of the process which made a philanthropist even of Mr. Scrooge."

COPENHAGEN.—M. Gade's newest work, Gefion, words by Oehlenschlæger, was successfully performed, for the first time, at the last concert of the Musical Union.

SOMETHING ABOUT FRANZ SCHUBERT.*

II.

Appended are two letters of the years 1823 and 1824, to Schober:—

"Vienna, the 30*th December*, 1823.

"Dear Schober,—For some time past, I have been wanting very much to write to you, but I could never get to do it. You know how that happens. Before doing anything else I must send you a lament on the state of our set, as well as on everything else; with the exception of my health, which (thank God) now appears as though it would become settled, everything is going on wretchedly. Our set lost in you, as I plainly foresaw it would, its † fulcrum. Bruchmann, who has returned from his journey, is no longer what he was. He appears to be adapting himself to the forms of the world, and by that fact alone he loses his nimbus, which, to my mind, consisted only in the persevering disregard of all worldly business. Kupelwieser, as you probably already know, has gone to Rome (but is not especially pleased with his Raphael). What relates to the rest, you know better than I do. As compensation for you and Kupelwieser, we got, it is true, four individuals, namely: the Hungarian"—[here follow the names, which it is better to omit.] "But the majority of such individuals render the society only more insignificant instead of more sterling. What do we want with a lot of quite ordinary students and Government officials? If Bruchmann is not present, or, consequently, ill, you hear nothing for hours together, under the supreme direction of Mohn‡ (the painter) "but eternal conversations about knitting and fencing, and horses and dogs. If things continue in this fashion, it is probable I shall not be able to stand the set much longer.

"Matters connected with my two operas, moreover, are very bad. Kupelwieser" (secretary at the Imperial and Royal Court of the palace) "has suddenly left the theatre. Weber's Euryanthe turned out badly, and, in my opinion, did not deserve to be well received. These facts, and a fresh separation between Palfy and Barbaja, leave me scarcely any hopes for my opera. It would really, however, be no advantage to have a work brought out, as everything is now done most horribly.

"Vogl is here, and has sung once at Bruchmann's and once at Witzeck's. He devotes himself almost exclusively to my songs. He writes out the vocal part himself, and, so to speak, lives upon it. And now let me have a line from you. How are you? Have you already appeared before the eyes of the world?"

Schober was then living in Breslau, with Schatt, Steffens, Holtei, and other clever friends. It was his intention to go upon the stage, an intention he afterwards carried into execution.

"I entreat you to let me hear from you very soon, and, satisfy in some degree my earnest desire to know something about you, by writing to say how you are and what you are doing. I have composed nothing since the opera except one or two Miller's Songs. They appear in four parts, with vignettes by Schwind. I hope, by-the-bye, to recover my health, and, if I am fortunate enough to do so, it will make me forget much that I have had to bear. So, my dear Schober, I shall never forget, for what you have been to me, no one else, unfortunately, can ever be. And now fare right well and do not forget your ever loving friend, FRANZ SCHUBERT.

"My address:—Stubenthor-Bastei, 1187. First floor."

The other letter is as follows:—

"The 21*st September*, 1824.

"Dear Schober,—I hear that you are not happy! and must sleep off the fumes of your despair! Is this so? Schwind is my informant. Although this grieves me profoundly, it does not astonish me in the least, as this is the lot of nearly every man of intelligence in this wretched world. Besides, what should we do with happiness, when mis-fortune is the sole stimulus left us. Were we only together, you, Schwind, Kuppel, and I, every bit of bad luck would weigh but lightly with me; we are separated, each in a different corner, and it is that which is really my misfortune. I feel inclined to exclaim with Goethe: 'Wer bringt nur eine Stunde jener holden Zeit zurück!'‖ of that time when we used to sit cosily together, and each of us, with motherly bashfulness, uncovered the children of his art and showed them to his companions, awaiting, not without anxiety, the judgment affection and truth would utter—of that time, when one inspired the other, and thus a united endeavour to attain what was most beautiful animated us all. Now here I am alone, far away in this land of Hungary, whither I unfortunately allowed myself to be lured a second time, without having one single human being with whom I can exchange a sensible word. Since the time you went away I have composed scarcely any songs, but I have tried my hand on some instrumental things. What will become of my operas, Heaven only knows! Though I have been well for five months, my good spirits are frequently clouded by the absence of yourself and Kuppel, and I sometimes pass very wretched days; in one of those hours of melancholy, when I felt with especial acuteness the do-nothing insignificant life which characterizes our age, the following piece of poetry escaped from me. I send it only because I know that you reprove even my weaknesses with love and indulgence:—

"KLAGE AN DAS VOLK!

"O Jugend unerer Zeit, Du bist dahin!
Die Kraft zutätigem Volke, sie ist vergeudet,
Nicht ehrer von der Menge sieht unterscheidet,
Und nichts bedeutend all' vorüberzieh'n.
Zu grosser Schmerz, der nächstig mich verzehrt,
Und nur als Letztes jener Kraft mir bleibet,
Dem thätlos mich auch diese Zeit zer stäubet,
Die jedem Grossen zu vollbringen wehrt.
Im stillen Alter schleicht dies Volk mehr,
Die Thaten seiner Jugend wähnt es Träume,
Ja spottet thöricht jener gold'nen Reime,
Nichts achtend ihres Kraft'gen Inhalt mehr.
Nur Dir, o heil'ge Kunst, ist noch gegönnt
Im Bild die Zeit der Kraft und That zu schildern,
Um weniger den grossen Schmerz zu mindern,
Der nimmer mit dem Schicksal sie versöhnt.

"With Leidesdorf (the publisher) things have gone badly up to this datum; he cannot pay, and buys nothing from anyone, neither my music or anybody else's, except mi-serable effusions that are the fashion.

"I have now made you tolerably well acquainted with my present position, and I anxiously look forward to hear as soon as possible what yours is, what I should like best would be for you to return to Vienna. That you are in good health I do not doubt. And now fare right well, and write to me as soon as you can.—Yours,

SCHUBERT, Adieu!!!

"My address:—Zelcz, Hungary, by Raab and Torok, at Count Joh. Esterhazy's."

NEW MUSIC.

Dr. Spark has issued the fifth part of his Organist's Quarterly Journal of Original Compositions (Novello, Ewer, & Co.), and we shall be surprised if it do not receive a special welcome. The pieces it contains are, for the most part, short, and all of them are within the reach of ordinary players. We are glad to see that the Editor has taken a thoroughly practical view of his task; and issued music likely to be practically useful. The number opens with a fughetta, by G. Kühmstedt, of Erfurt, which has a singularly quaint subject, and is so well written that brevity becomes a fault. An introductory voluntary, by Henry Smart, is very pleasing, and contains a full allowance of the composer's characteristic elegance. A melody by E. Silas is more difficult, and also more dry. But Herr Silas is always clever, and something can always be learned from him. Dr. Steggall's Allegretto Pastorale, runs smoothly enough, without exciting extraordinary interest; while Dr. Spark's choral hymn, "In Memoriam," arrests attention by its unaffected pathos. A prelude and postlude, by E. Batiste, will highly delight those who affect organ music of the French school. The latter is a specially vigorous composition, and secures bold effects by a small expenditure of means. Both are easy. A larghetto by G. A. Macfarren, and a well-written theme by F. W. Bird, complete a number of exceptional value.

Nos. 1, 2, and 3 of Chappell's Organ Journal (Chappell & Co.) are devoted to arrangements by Dr. Spark of movements from the Messe Solennelle. No 1. contains the "Sanctus" with its introductory ritornelle; No. 2, the "Domine Deus;" and No. 3, the "Gratias agimus." In each case the arranger has kept strictly to the composer's text; and laid out his music for organs of moderate capacity with considerable skill. The result is certain to please those who wish to delight their congregations with Rossini's last strains.

Among the songs recently published by Messrs. Duncan Davison & Co. is "The Song of the Breeze," music by W. H. Holmes, a work which shows plainly enough the hand of an experienced musician. The melody is bright and animated throughout, while some passages, as, for example, that beginning "I have stolen away on my silken wing," are particularly charming. We know no new song more likely to obtain extraordinary favour. "My Bonnie Soldier Lad," by T. Arnaut, and "The great sea calmly sleeping," by R. Hogarth Patterson, are also just issued by Messrs. Davison & Co. The first is a simple ballad, wherein a maiden declares her trust of an absent lover; its music is appropriate and expressive. The second, in which Mr. George Hogarth has set symphonies and accompaniment, is, also, unpretending, but not without a certain unaffected gracefulness.

"The Turn of the Tide" (Weekes & Co.), by Nicholas Heins, is not the particular "Turn of the Tide" which street-ballads so often bid us wait for; but a very well written sentimental song. In some passages of it there is evidence of more than average power, though the shape in which it appears is of an ordinary sort. The words, by Miss Agnes Trevor, are good, and the song is dedicated to Mr. Frank Bernard, whose play seems to have suggested it. A waltz entitled "Buttercups and Daisies" (F. Montrie), by Arthur J. Birtchnell, is a very ordinary affair. We wonder, for the hundredth time in connexion with waltzes, who advised the composer to print it. Another waltz, "The Duchess" (J. Williams), by Henry Farmer, has merit, and may claim to be a good example of its kind.

Among recent revivals are fragments from Stradella's Medea (C. Lonsdale), edited by J. Pittman, and printed "from a rare and unpublished MS." This interesting work comes to us as an old world waif, of no practical value, but, nevertheless, one which every musical student should possess, as an example of an eminent master, and a good specimen of the operatic music of his period.

MR. DICKENS'S READINGS.

On Tuesday night Mr. Charles Dickens resumed the series of farewell readings which was interrupted by his illness last year. Notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather the large room of the St. James's Hall was well filled; and only very few even of the sofa stalls remained vacant throughout the evening. As this ample attendance on a wet and disagreeable evening showed that the readings are as attractive as ever, so the warmth of the applause which greeted Mr. Dickens's appearance proved that the reader himself has not during his temporary absence from the platform lost his hold upon the sympathies of the public. The portions of his works which Mr. Dickens read were selected from David Copperfield and the Pickwick Papers.

OPERA IN NEW YORK.

After the rational enjoyment of freedom the highest manifestation of civilisation is, undoubtedly, found in a respect for and culture of esthetic art, and Music, by reason of its universality and bearing upon popular morals, is certainly one of the most important means of refinement; and in this aspect of the subject we feel, therefore, no light interest in the good management of the Academy of Music in New York city. It is but justice to say, in this connexion, that we feel greatly indebted to Mr. Max Maretzek, not only for the good taste he has displayed in resisting the invasion of that new French school whereof Offenbach and Hervé are the leaders, but for his persistent efforts, year after year, to make possible and permanent among us a legitimate opera interpreting the highest style of musical profession. To Maretzek, indeed, we are indebted for the position—at least in the third rank—which our Academy occupies among musical nations, since, if we rate behind Paris and Milan, we are in advance of London and St. Petersburgh; while, for an artist to have been adopted by the public of New York is already a successful step in ascending the French or Italian stage. Mr. Maretzek's present artistic company is, perhaps, the most complete ever presented on the Academy boards, which justifies the real furore exhibited at the first performance. Certainly our public owes something to its favourite impresario, and appreciates his struggle to promote an opera worthy of the metropolis. But why is not popular favour seconded in other quarters quite as directly interested? Why are stockholders so sharp, and artists so dull, too often, in their prejudices? Why, instead of recognizing in their manager, a friend and partner, do they so frequently treat him as a foe? Why, instead of smoothing his path (which is their own), do they hamper it with needless difficulties? We can understand, of course, that mediocre talent, jealous of praise, should be chagrined when the public neglect or directors decline to run after it? But when ample success consecrates such genuine merit as that of Madame Brid, who proved herself the superb artist in Trovatore, or that of Cottone, who has won distinction in Havana, we confess our inability to comprehend why any professional jealousy should influence their artistic inclinations. No tenor has dared since Duprez to sing Guillaume Tell—that master-piece of the greatest musical school. Yet we have now on our New York stage a tenor who fears not to attempt the part, M. Lefranc, a French omnibus conductor, who five years ago was on his box, collecting six cents apiece from passengers, and who to-day commands thousands of dollars from the American public—M. Lefranc is ready to sing Guillaume Tell, and Maretzek is willing to encounter the expense of such a representation as would be a triumph of operatic art. But Madame Briol objects to the rôle of Mathilde. Why? Well, because it is against the established etiquette or precedence! If you desire to know more, you will be disappointed. These heroic scruples are not intelligible to common mortals. Neither you nor we can understand why Madame Briol, after winning a triumph in Leonora of Trovatore, shall decline to appear in Mathilde of Guillaume Tell. But so it is; and we can only hope that the accomplished lady may be better advised and consent to look at things from a higher point of artistic view, satisfied that her audiences will not fail to recognize her artistic power under whatever character it manifests itself. As for M. Cottone, that excellent baritone, we counsel him, in the kindest spirit, to avoid becoming entangled by unworthy complications. He has a career before him, and ought not to blunder. In conclusion, we trust all differences will be speedily adjusted, so that our opera-going public may enjoy a winter of real gratification. With a roll of such names as Lefranc, Barili, Ronconi, Reyal, Cottone, Kellogg, Briol, &c., Manager Maretzek, with the sympathy and co-operation of his company, ought to give us a brilliant season, compensating alike to director and artists.—American Paper.

Balfe's Bohemian Girl (La Bohémienne) is an undoubted success at the Théâtre Lyrique. The composer is still in Paris, we regret to say, not yet quite recovered from his indisposition.

Mr. Oberthür leaves London, on Monday evening, for a professional tour on the Continent, commencing at the Philharmonic Society, of Calais. From Calais he proceeds to Lille, where he is to play his Concertino for harp and orchestra, at the Société du Cercle du Nord. From Lille he goes to Saxe Meiningen, Berlin, and other German towns, where he is invited to perform at the Court concerts.

The Gipsy musicians at the "Hopfengarten" in Pesth put a five fly in the hand of the individual whom they choose to go round and solicit money. He is required to have the fly still alive when he returns, as proof that he has not opened his hand, and, consequently, not helped himself to any portion of what he has succeeded in collecting. If he cannot show the fly, he gets nothing. The plan is ingenious, but does not say much for the opinion the Gipsies entertain of one another's honesty.

"Mr. Walter B. Gilbert, Mus. Bac. Oxon," says the New York Weekly Review, "has been appointed organist of Trinity Chapel, Fifth Avenue. Mr. Gilbert is known in this country as the composer of some popular hymns, and in England as a writer of cathedral music, and author of the oratorio of St. John."

The continued success of our countrywoman, Miss Anna Trafford, in Italy, is farther testified by the following from Saluzzo, dated December, 26:—

"Ebreo bene. Piacque molto la prima donna esordiente Anna Trafford (allieva dell'egregio maestro Sangiovanni). Alla sua aria ebbe una vera ovazione e chiamate. Bene Gozzolini, non male Azzolini e Cherubini (quanti ini)."

At the meetings of the Tonic Sol-fa College, just concluded (Young Men's Christian Association, Aldersgate Street), Mr. Curwen gave three lectures on the Art of Teaching, including the principles of written and oral method. Mr. A. J. Ellis, F.R.S., gave a lecture on Just Intonation, showing the importance of the partials (or harmonics) in the practical working of harmony. These partials were in just intonation, whatever our artificial instruments might be. After illustrating his subject by means of diagrams, he compared the different kinds of temperament with just intonation, by means of concertinas carefully tuned. Other papers were read by Mr. Ashcroft, on the Essential Conditions of a People's Song in Church; by Mr. J. Spencer Curwen, on Musical Notes on the Continent; by Mr. J. Proudman, on True Expression in Music, &c. Model lessons were given, by Mr. Proudman, on the mental effect of tones in key, and by Mr. Warr. Considerable discussion took place on the French Langue des durées, which has recently been adopted as a part of the Tonic Sol-fa method. The series of meetings ended with competitions for prizes and certificates, in various branches of musical knowledge and skill. The subjects included copying by ear, sight-singing, solo-singing, composition, and harmonium playing. There were sixty competitors, and prizes to the amount of £17 were distributed.

RIGA.—The centenary of the opening of the Theatre was celebrated lately by a special performance of Gluck's Orpheus.

MUNICH.—Herr Bargiel's "Prometheus Overture" was performed at a recent concert of the Musical Academy, under the direction of Herr Wüllner, for the first time in this capital.

KARLSRUHE.—Herr Emil Devrient, at the earnest solicitation of his physicians and friends, has resigned his post as Director-General of the Grand-Ducal Theatre, after having held it for 17 years. Herr Emil Devrient is now seventy. He will be succeeded by Herren Gustav Freitag and Bodenstedt.

A GERMAN ON THE SOCIAL POSITION OF MUSICIANS.*

The most varied opinions prevail regarding the position musicians occupy in society, what position they are justified in occupying, and in what way they should strive to achieve, and maintain it; every opinion is founded upon a different view of the subject; each claims to be the correct one; and each contains as great an amount of truth as of error. Good society affirms that it welcomes most cordially every musician worth anything; that it receives him on a footing of perfect equality, and that, even though he may not be very celebrated or particularly gifted, still, as an artist honourably striving to do his best, he may reckon upon a most friendly reception; that, among leading musicians, only the presumptuous and arrogant, and, also, such as combine insignificant productions with grand pretensions, find themselves slighted and humbled; but that their dissatisfaction is not the result of the treatment with which they meet, but of the too high opinion they entertain of themselves, an opinion which prevents them from obtaining a clear idea of their positions and their rights. We hear, on the other hand, reproaches against good society and its caprices; it is charged with patronizing only artists of great talent who have already attained a reputation with the public, and no longer require the patronage of individuals, or the marks of honour bestowed by them; that, among second-rate artists, the most friendly reception is by no means accorded to those striving honourably to achieve great things, but to those who understand how to gain the favour of the leading or the rich members of high society, and that it is utterly incomprehensible how many who have never been known to produce aught of importance meet with so much favour, and are admitted into the best circles, while others, who enjoy a higher rank in art, are left unnoticed. These opinions find an echo among artists themselves, according to their respective positions and circumstances. Among the great and celebrated who are honoured and esteemed, some entertain the honourable and sound belief, that they exclusively to sincere and unbiassed enthusiasm for art the marks of distinction which they receive; others are pleased that they, as individuals, should mix in high society and be made the objects of its attentions; that is sufficient for their ambition, and all searching questions are a matter of indifference to them. Second-rate musicians, of course, judge general social relations according to the place assigned in those relations to themselves. The composer or virtuoso who is often invited to dinner or to an evening party, by her influence the Countess-and-So, or by Madame la Commerzienrath Three-Stars, and introduced to their acquaintances, feels perfectly charmed by the amiability of such society, and cannot, or will not, comprehend how anyone can doubt the sincere love of art and the mission of artists of eminence to assist and maintain the freedom and independence of their position more than they hitherto have done, because they are the only persons who can do so.

In former times, the patronage and encouragement accorded to art proceeded—and in the case of music, exclusively—from the higher classes. The nobility of South Germany cultivated music with assiduity, and many families maintained private musical establishments (Kapellen) of their own; it was the members of this aristocracy that subscribed to concerts, which were never got up unless a subscription had been previously opened. The history of the greatest composers shows that the patronage of the nobility exercised the greatest influence upon their career—it proves to anyone who considers the question attentively that Haydn, one and all, were dependent to every day of their fate, and was so modest and amiable, enjoyed in a high degree the patronage of the aristocracy, while the independent Mozart, who looked the world more boldly in the face, is always complaining, in his letters, that he has to worry himself to no purpose. Beethoven was the first who ventured to place himself on an equality with the aristocracy; he succeeded, because a man so grandly endowed by nature could not fail to take the upper hand; how far the little word "can," which, before the decision of the Landesgericht,† was regarded as a predicate of nobility, contributed to the fact that the highest aristocracy treated him with such great consideration, and even put up with his outbursts of temper, is something to which we may here cursorily refer—that many members of this same aristocracy were sincere admirers and thorough judges of music; and that they would have recognized Beethoven as a great genius, even had he not come before them as "van Beethoven," are facts that cannot be contested, but it is equally impossible to deny that in a country where there existed a separate tribunal for cases affecting persons of noble birth, the fact that the great musical genius was of (supposed) noble descent, must have exercised at first a very great influence upon his social relations.

In North Germany, matters always were a very different aspect. The higher classes there had far less influence upon the intellectual development of the nation, and scarcely troubled themselves about music at all. Even the example of the great Frederick who cultivated music—in his own way, it is true*—honouring art and artists, found no imitators among the aristocracy. The middle classes have been, from the middle of the last century, the patrons of music; in every town of any importance there have been well-attended subscription concerts, and it was not in the capitals of the princes of North Germany, but in Leipsic and Hamburgh that the greatest musicians and teachers resided; it was to the latter city that Ph. Em. Bach, among others, removed, though he held in Berlin the post emeritata to the great monarch.

This short retrospective view of the matter is instructive for the present age, inasmuch as the latter exhibits a continuation of the relations formerly subsisting between musicians and the upper classes. Although the South German nobility no longer occupies the politico-social position, in which it gave the tone to all artistic relations, it still exhibits a lively and active interest in any one or any thing of importance; and though, on the other hand, the higher classes in the North of Germany manifest a far greater sympathy for art than is manifested in former times, the centre of gravity of art-life is still situated in the towns inhabited by the middle classes more exclusively; it was not in the capitals that Hiller, Mendelssohn, and Schumann worked and laboured. The musical festivals for which St. Paul was composed, were founded by commercial and manufacturing towns, and while, even at the present day, the incentive to a good portion of the artistic successes achieved in the South still proceeds from the higher classes, causing those successes to extend still further, there are good reasons for asserting that most successes in the North have forced their way from the towns to the capitals, and that it is the great reputation first achieved by composers at musical festivals and at subscription concerts that has served to guide the elegant concert-public in the preferences of the different capitals. The cases of very great virtuosos, who have played in empty or only half-filled rooms, but who after immense successes elsewhere (Leipsic, etc.), reported here, (in Berlin), have given concerts, when the rooms have been crammed to suffocation, and still continue to be so, are too well-known, that it is immaterial to mention particular instances or to cite names.

What are we to conclude from this? Simply, thus much: that musicians will never obtain an independent social position until those who are not celebrated no longer condescend to guide that to

"REVIVALS."

(From the "Sunday Times," Jan. 16.)

Welcome to the beginning of an act of justice which, for completion, requires the help of all who know what masterpieces of music the world has passed by and forgotten. Now that we have no great creative genius among us, men are beginning to search out the works of composers who, living in the wonderful era which began with Bach and ended with Mendelssohn, were neglected for masters greater than themselves. There are many such works; not o few of them such as desire a high place in public esteem; and he who brings them out into the light does e specially good service, not loss to his generation than to the memory of composers. For this reason we are pleased to receive No. 1 of a series of "Revivals," which "will consist of pieces hitherto only existing in manuscript or which have been out of print, selected from the works of eminent masters." The firm undertaking the grateful, and we hope profitable, task of publication is that of Messrs. Duncan Davison & Co., while the editor, Mr. J. W. Davison, is a gentleman whose fitness for the work nobody will think of questioning, and whose name affords a guarantee of judicious selection. A good beginning has been made by the issue of W. Friedemann Bach's grand Fantasia, as played by Madame Arabella Goddard at the last Monday Popular Concert. Concerning this work we shall do well to quote from Mr. Chappell's annotated programme. "No reference is made," says the writer, "to this interesting, original, and masterly composition in the Catalogue raisonée thematique, &c., of the works of W. F. Bach, which forms part of C. H. Ritter's comprehensive book—Carl Philipp Emanuel und Wilhelm Friedemann Bach und deren Brüder. That it has, hitherto, remained in manuscript may, therefore, be considered certain. Herr Ritter not only describes in his catalogue works that are printed, but speaks of a vast number that are unpublished. Nevertheless, he is evidently ignorant of the Fantasia, as well as of a great many more compositions by the same hand." Under the conditions thus pointed out, the publication before us has a special interest, which the fact that W. F. Bach's work is one of merit increases. The writer above quoted says it is "as much in the style and plan of a sonata as more than one of the sonatas of Beethoven. It comprises four movements, the second, third, and fourth of which are as regular in form as any movement of the kind which could be named. The first movement only is o free fantasia. The oldest Bach himself has left examples of the kind; so has Mozart; so has Beethoven. Little matters the form, however, when there is so much that is beautiful as in this Fantasia by W. F. Bach." Finally, we read: "When it is remembered that the Fantasia, the exact date of which it is impossible to ascertain, must be, according to a fair calculation, considerably over a century and a quarter old, the freshness of its ideas is something to wonder at." After hearing and reading the composition for ourselves we have nothing to say of it but words of praise. The first movement begins with some brilliant arpeggios in E minor, and is continued by a series of passages running through various keys, and showing not only fertile but graceful fancy. All are written with singular freedom, and savour as little as may be of the starched and formal style generally associated with music of the period. The second movement in E major is an effective contrast. Placid in character and regular in form, it is at the antipodes of the erratic Fantasia preceding. Its first two phrases bear a singular resemblance to the corresponding phrases in "Away with melancholy;" and it is upon these in their primary form, inverted, or slightly varied, that the movement is chiefly built. The simple grace of the music deserves all that can be said in its praise. The Andante, in A minor, is written mainly in two parts, upon a quaint and characteristic theme which appears alternately for either hand. Its treatment is original, as well as marked in an eminent degree by the "freshness of idea" already pointed out. A sustained pedal, during which the first theme breaks up and fades away, brings this admirable Andante to an end. The Rondo finale in A major, if less novel than the earlier movements, is equally attractive as regards the charm of its music. Moreover, it reveals in an equal degree the accomplished master whose graceful themes are combined with artistic treatment in such a manner that the art is concealed, and we think only of the beauty it has produced. Let us say, finally, with reference to this work, that if subsequent numbers of "Revivals" prove equal in interest, music lovers will owe a good deal to the editor and publishers.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

After an interval devoted to pantomime and other holiday amusements, the Crystal Palace concerts began again last Saturday, in a manner that promises well for the rest of the season. Mr. Manns had evidently laboured hard to bring his orchestra up to the mark, below which a long spell of pantomime music must have forced it. He succeeded admirably; the first overture—Beethoven's Coriolan—being played with splendid unity and power. The work itself is a fine example of dramatic music. In the words of the annotated programme, "it is indeed a work of Roman grandeur and stern Roman compression and conciseness; but with a vein of pure, noble beauty, revealing the well-spring of grace and sweetness which was always playing beneath the stern exterior of the great musician." There is not, perhaps, in all music a more effective contrast than between the two subjects of this overture; the one, vigorous and stern as Coriolanus himself, who

"——— By his rare example made the coward Turn terror into sport;"

the other, as gentle and graceful as the woman who adorned the hero's home. Such an example of Beethoven's greatest power ought to have been applauded to the echo. But as the audience let it pass with little notice, we can only say so much the worse for the audiance. The symphony was Mendelssohn's in A minor—that in which is recorded for all time the vivid impressions made by Scottish scenery upon a young and poetical nature. About the work itself there is no need to speak. Every bar is known as it deserves, and no music of the kind holds a higher place in general estimation. It ought to be mentioned, however, as an interesting fact that, in a letter to his friend, Klingemann, dated "Edinburg, July 30, 1829," Mendelssohn penned the first sixteen bars of the symphony he did not complete till 1842. No doubt can exist, therefore, even if the character of the music were not sufficient evidence, that the "A minor" was directly inspired by its composer's now historical journey. Every movement was heard on Saturday with unflagging attention. Which of the four met with the greatest favour is hard to tell, but it may have been the scherzo, that "wonderful compound," according to the official annotator, "of health and life, heath and moor, blowing wind, screaming eagles, bagpipes, fluttering tartans, and elastic steps of racing Highlanders, all rounded off and brought into one perfect picture with the most consummate art that ever human eye painter, poet, or musician ever possessed." Weber's overture to Euryanthe, another favourite composition with the Crystal Palace audience, followed the symphony and closed the concert. The instrumental solos were Mendelssohn's organ sonata, No. 4, and Bach's prelude, in E flat, with the "St. Ann's" fugue. The official announcers, of the brothers Arthur and Charles Le Jeune that it would be almost enough to mention them in connection with these great works; but the performance of each was specially remarkable for all that constitutes perfect organ playing. Master Charles Le Jeune, playing Bach's magnificent fugue in knickerbockers, amounts to a marvel. Mr. Santley was the vocalist, and gave, with great success, Sullivan's admirable ode, "I wish to tune my quivering lyre."

NATIONAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

Elijah was given by this society on Wednesday evening week in Exeter Hall. The conditions of its performance were not entirely favourable. In the first place Mr. Martin's chorus mustered in such scanty numbers that the entire orchestra could not have counted 400 heads. We were sorry to observe this, because the chorus has, hitherto, been the strength of the society, and its falling off has an ominous look. The occurrence, however, may have been accidental—at any rate it in so to be hoped. In the next place, some of the principal singers failed to appear. Hence, the double quartet was given as a double trio; and, if we do not mistake, the conductor himself had to assist vocally in "O, come, every one that thirsteth." On the other hand, the orchestra was more than commonly efficient, and such of the chorus as did put in an appearance sang vigorously and well. The soloists were Madame Rudersdorff, Miss Palmer, Mr. George Perren, and Mr. Renwick. Madame Rudersdorff again showed that she stands at the head of interpreters of the "widow music." In "Hear ye, Israel," moreover, she made a great effect, and was greatly applauded. Miss Palmer and Mr. Perren sang carefully; the latter being very successful in "If with all your hearts," which he gave with a good deal of refined expression. Mr. Renwick's voice is hardly as pleasant as could be wished, and he used it on this occasion so as to suggest a ranting prophet rather than the dignified Man of God whom the Bible depicts and Mendelssohn coloured with his consummate art. Mr. G. W. Martin conducted.

At the next performance Mr. Martin promises the Walpurgis Night and a motet by Mendelssohn. T. E.

Figaro states that the Emperor never gives less than 5000fr. for a box at any of the theatres.

LEFÉBURE-WÉLY.

By the death of this great virtuoso, aristocratic and elegant Paris has lost its own particular organist, I mean that one among contemporary organists whose talent was a more faithful expression than that of any one else of a class of persons of the present epoch, who pursue the road to Heaven with every possible regard to their own comfort. This favour, this reputation, was something he saw spring up and grow without much effort on his part, for he simply obeyed his artistic temperament, and followed the impulses of a lively disposition, and of an extraordinarily fertile imagination.

Lefébure (Louis James Alfred), born at Paris, the 13th November, 1817, was the son of an organist of St. Roch. It is very certain that he knew his notes and his keyboard before he knew his letters. At the age of eight, he played his first mass. When he was fifteen, he acted as his father's substitute, and, about the same time, carried off at the Conservatory, where he had Halévy for master, the prizes for organ, counterpoint, and fugue. It was on the organ of St. Roch that he began to indulge in his picturesque and daring extempore playing, always elegant, and sometimes grand and elevated; it placed him at the head of a new school, which possesses the secret of combining, in due proportions, melody and sentiment with science.

On being appointed organist to the Madeleine, in 1847, he found an instrument of Cavaillé-Coll's. Its resources, until then ignored, were destined to put it in his power to realize all his inspirations. With what ardour, with what skill, did he not assist the impulse given to the organ-building of modern times by physical science! By constant application, he acquired the art of combination, exquisite taste, a happy mixture of the different stops, an inexhaustible variety of sonorous effect, and, lastly, his mechanical execution. He found, too, in the church, select, delicate, and impressionable hearers, who responded to his natural inclinations, and mundane tastes, and, by their suffrages, furnished with wings his exhibitions of extempore playing.

Lefébure was at the apogee of his reputation, when, in the month of April, 1863, he took possession of the great organ at St. Sulpice. In his new position, he found himself exposed to the jealousy of his rivals, and to a fresh outburst of criticism. The principal charges against him were the want of religious character in his ideas, and their pretension; these, however, constituted a great portion of the secret by which he achieved success in a church, the services of which should be distinguished by a great austerity of character. He could not bring himself not to shine, not to please, not to "faire diverisre," and for this he sacrificed seriousness. The mathematical side of his art, the cold and inflated style of the fugue, damped his dashing nature. Not that he ignored or did not appreciate these things; far from it. In his note-book, under the date of May, 1863, I extemporized calmly an interminable fugue for them; I hope they will not now say that I can play only polkas!" He was a profound harmonist, and no one was more capable of coming back to his melody, by a series of chords, sometimes astonishingly daring. On other occasions, a simple modulation sufficed to carry him away from the original theme. Yet, such was his love for art, that he neglected nothing which could contribute to expand and embellish the theme. For instance, every Sunday, he used to read over the particular Offertory of the day, and then extemporized according to the sense and character of the words. Quelle ressource every good organist to do the same? His extempore playing was, indeed, the accentuated re-echo of his nervous disposition. He entranced and carried away even those who did not like his manner. Rossini said to him one day, very justly: "People like you much more for your faults than for your good qualities."

A blade so thoroughly tempered, naturally wore out the scabbard. On the organ at St. Sulpice, an organ requiring a great deal of physical strength, Lefébure, whose health was already much shaken, expended his energies with an ardour that accelerated his end. He was eaten up by fever; his extempore playing revealed his state. "He seemed to fear," as our colleague, Hip. Prévost wrote, the other day, "that he would not have sufficient time to sing, in his own harmonious language, all the melodies in his soul." The moment arrived, however, when he was compelled to beg M. Louis Dessane, the organist of the choir, to take his place "up there;" when he was compelled to trust his reputation to that gentleman, as distinguished as modest, who, during this fatal time, he designated as his successor—and this artistic testament will, doubtless, be carried out. It was only with great difficulty that Lefébure could now ascend the steep stairs leading to the organ loft. One day, not long since, he promised to perform at a marriage, and he wished to keep his word. He was, therefore, laboriously making his way up, when suddenly the sound of the blow, given by the Swiss with his halberd, announced the commencement of the ceremony. In less time than is required to write down the fact, the gallant artist, ran up forty steps, and, bathed in perspiration, and suffering from a cough which brought the blood-tinged foam to his lips, he placed his hands upon the keyboard. He was never, perhaps, grander. It was his last piece of extempore playing; the farewell of the organist to the organ, the strains of which are like an echo of the Infinite.

Lefébure-Wély wrote a great deal for his instrument; for the harmonium; and for the voice. I will cite merely his "Cantiques," which are exceedingly well known; a remarkable "O Salutaris;" a collection of "Offertories;" some pieces composed expressly for the Mustel Harmonium; a fantasia entitled Titania, for piano; the "Dite sympathique," dedicated to his two daughters, &c. At the Opéra-Comique, he brought out a work, Les Recruteurs, in which Capoul made his first appearance, but which was not a success. It is but a few days since that, with a hand already struck by death, he traced his last reminiscence: "Le chant du Cygne," a melancholy reverie, for piano-forte and harmonium, in which we perceive very plainly the presentiment of his approaching death. He has left some posthumous works. "In all that he composed"—as M. Ambroise Thomas, a most competent judge, proclaimed, at the tomb—"we must always admire the grace, the good taste, the purity of the style. He has left works, noble in character, and elevated in sentiment, which will bear evidence of his passage among us, and of the influence he must have exerted." A sure, devoted, and faithful friend; endowed with exciting frankness, tempered, however, by a large amount of kindness; an amiable companion; generous with the calculating spirit peculiar to musicians; witty and caustic like a real child of Paris, as he was, and, moreover, a spoilt child of Paris; of naturally distinguished manners, an enemy of everything trivial and commonplace; possessing, like all men on whom fortune smiles when they are young, a very strong opinion of himself individually, and never neglecting an opportunity of declaring his own merit, such, with well-defined activity, and exceeding versatility of humour, is the complete physiognomy of Lefébure-Wély, whose reputation extended to foreign countries, especially Germany.

This valiant and sincere artist has left his mark. In the gallery of organists—St. Sulpice, in which Nivers represents Corneille, Clerambault, majesty; Coppeau, religious unction; Nicolas Séjan, elevated thought; Louis Séjan, elegance of form; and Georges Schmitt, impetuosity, and brilliancy; Lefébure-Wély may claim many of the qualities of his predecessors, adding the radiant charm of melody, and the scintillations of a most charming fancy.

He leaves many sympathizing friends, whose feelings of esteem are now, alas! directed exclusively to his two charming daughters, his son, and his wife, herself an eminent artist, who appreciated him so well, and loved him so much.

NORWICH MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

An adjourned meeting of the supporters of this Festival has been held at Norwich—Lord Stafford in the chair—to consider future arrangements. A report was read from a special committee, who stated that they did not take a gloomy view of the future of the Festival, as they believed that the financial failure of the 1869 meeting arose from purely local causes, and also from the depression of trade throughout the country. In the 1836 meeting there was a deficiency of £231, but at the next meeting, in 1839, there was a surplus of £821; in 1854 there was a deficiency of £103, but in 1857, at the following Festival, there was a surplus of £1,873; in 1836, there was a profit of £2,399; in 1827, one of £1,673; in 1830, one of £536; in 1833, one of £448; in 1839, one of £821; in 1842, one of £550; in 1845, one of £950; in 1848, one of £500; in 1852, one of £370; in 1857, one of £351; in 1860, one of £916; in 1863, one of £1,236; and in 1866, one of £971. Thus a deficiency at one Festival was not to be considered a bar to complete recovery at the next. The committee did not consider that any reduction could be advantageously made in the expenses of the Festival, but they recommended that the prices of admission at the next Festival should be reduced from 21s. and 10s. 6d. to 15s. and 7s. 6d. at the evening concerts, with some unreserved seats at 3s., some unreserved seats to be also provided at the morning oratorios, at 5s. each. The committee further recommended that the next Festival should be held in the week following September 20, 1872; that the committee should commence the arrangements for the Festival in June, 1871; that the number of the sub-committee should be reduced to ten; and that the introduction of novelties should be limited to one great work, which must be ready for rehearsal six months before the Festival. A general committee was appointed, after some discussion, and to the general committee the report of the special committee was referred for further consideration.

A RUSSIAN COUNT, when he found a tenor visiting his wife early in the night, made the singer sit at the piano and sing opera airs for five hours under the cover of a pistol.

SIGNOR VERA'S opera, Valeria, which was so successfully given at Bologna last year, is to be performed at Turin at the Vittorio Emanuele Theatre, in a few days, where it will be sung by Mesdames Vera Lorini and Mazzucco, and by Signori Urio and Coliva. The same opera is to be given during the carnival at Florence, at the Pergola Theatre, with Madame Biancolini, and Signori Perotti and Sparapani.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

The Creation was given on Friday se'nnight to the crowded audience invariably attracted by Haydn. Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Santley appeared as soloists. The lady is, perhaps, heard to better advantage in this oratorio than in any other. It affords full scope for the display of her bright voice, and gives less occasion for the peculiar expression in which she is apt to indulge. "With verdure clad" and "On mighty pens" were well sung and loudly applauded. Mr. Vernon Rigby was hardly in such good voice as usual, a fact to be explained, most likely, by recent illness. This, however, did not account for his dwelling on every high note in the popular tenor song, to the destruction of rhythm, and the balance of Haydn's well-balanced phrases. We counsel Mr. Rigby to avoid the habit. Mr. Santley sang his music as usual; and how that is we have no need to tell. As a matter of course he was vehemently applauded. The choruses were given with immense power. "The heavens are telling" was alone worth going to hear. Sir Michael Costa conducted. Elijah was to be given last night. T. E.

THE GREAT SOUTH KENSINGTON ORGAN.

The following is the official specification of the grand organ for the Royal Albert Hall of Arts and Sciences, South Kensington, now in course of construction by Mr. Henry Willis, of the Rotunda Organ Works, Camden Town, London:—

The instrument consists of five Claviers. The compass of the four Manual Claviers extends from CC to C in altissime (five complete octaves, or sixty-one notes), and that of the Pedale from CCC to G (two octaves and a fifth, or thirty-two notes). The Pedal Organ consists of 21 stops, viz.:—

1. Double Open Diapason, wood, 32 feet.
2. Double Open Diapason, metal, 32 feet.
3. Contra Violone, metal, 32 feet.
4. Open Diapason, wood, 16 feet.
5. Open Diapason, metal, 16 feet.
6. Bourdon, wood, 16 feet.
7. Violone, metal, 16 feet.
8. Great Quint, metal, 12 feet.
9. Violoncello, metal, 8 feet.
10. Octave, wood, 8 feet.
11. Quint, metal, 6 feet.
12. Super Octave, metal, 4 feet.
13. Furniture, 5 ranks.
14. Mixture, 3 ranks.
15. Contra Posaune, wood. 32 feet

19. Trombone, metal, 16 feet.
20. Fagotto, wood, 8 feet.
21. Clarion, metal, 8 feet.

The inside pipes belonging to those stops that contribute to the front are similarly shaped in month, body, and foot.

The first Manual Clavier or Choir Organ, contains 20 stops, viz:—

1. Violone, 16 feet.
2. Viola da Gamba, 8 feet.
3. Dulciana, 8 feet.
4. Lieblich Gedact, 8 feet.
5. Open Diapason, 8 feet.
6. Vox Angelica, 8 feet.
7. Principal (harmonic), 4 feet.
8. Gemshorn, 4 feet.

The pipes in this organ are of metal. The effect of wood is imparted by the harmonic construction, and the disadvantage of using wood for small pipes is therefore avoided. The stops numbered 1, 3, 6, 8, 9, 11, 14, and 17 are intended to represent what is called the "Echo Organ" in some large organs, and in them placed on a fifth Clavier.

The second Clavier, or Great Organ, contains 25 stops, viz.:—

1. Double Diapason, 16 feet.
2. Bourdon, 16 feet.
3. Salicional, 8 feet.
4. Open Diapason, 8 feet.
5. Viola da Gamba, 8 feet.
6. Flûten à Cheminées, 8 feet.
7. Claribel Flute, 8 feet.

Of these stops only [the basses of the Bourdon and Claribel Flute of wood.

The Fourth Clavier, or Solo Organ, is to contain 20 stops, viz.:—

1. Contra Basso, 16 feet.
2. Flûte à Pavillon, 8 feet.
3. Viola d'Amore, 8 feet.
4. Flûte Harmonique, 8 feet.
5. Claribel Flute, 8 feet.
6. Voix Celeste, 8 feet.
7. Flûte transverière, 4 feet.

3. Swell Sub Octave (on itself).
4. Swell Super Octave (on itself).
5. Unison Solo to Great Organ.
6. Unison Swell to Great Organ.
7. Unison Choir to Great Organ.
8. Swell to Choir.
9. Solo to Choir.
10. Solo to Pedals.
11. Swell to Pedals.
12. Great to Pedals.
13. Choir to Pedals.
14. Sforzando.

A double acting vertical movement struck by the heel of either foot instantly detaches and connects the movement of the Pedal Organ from all but the Bourdon, Violone, Open Diapason (metal), and Octave, and also draws and withdraws the pedal coupler to Great Organ. Eight patent pneumatic combination pistons govern the whole of the stops of each Manual Organ. These thirty-two pistons appear immediately below and in front of each clavier, concentrated so as to be at all times within reach of the hands of the performer. Six pedals govern the stops of the Pedal Organ by means of ventils. Two pedals apply and detach a movement that causes the sforesaid six pedals governing the Pedal Organ to act also upon the combination movement of the Great Organ. Six pedals govern and combine in various ways all the other accessories, and thus, by one instantaneous operation of the performer, vary the effect of the whole instrument at once. Two tremulants, governed by pedals, one to the Swell, the other to the Solo Organ, are supplied. These tremulants act only upon suitable stops. The Sforzando is brought into action by means of a pedal. Two pedals govern the great to pedal coupler. The patent atmospheric contrivance of 1862 for actuating the Swell independently of the swell pedals is also applied.

The internal metal pipes consist of 5-9ths lamb-stamp commercial tin and 4-9ths soft lead, and the scales of these, as well as those of the front, are suitable to the proportions of the building. All the front pipes are made of tin 90 and lead 10 in 100 parts, and are burnished and polished in the same manner as those in the best Continental organs. The key fittings are elegant in design, the combination pistons being plated with gold and engine-turned. The claviers are made of very thick ivory.

The main reservoirs in which the compressed air is forced are placed in a chamber prepared in a clean and dry locality. The feeders supply the air by steam power, are of the most ample size, and constructed to receive their wind from the room above, and not from the locality in which they are placed. To carry out this arrangement (of the highest importance) passages are provided for the wind shafts to and from the organ to the chamber in which the main reservoirs are placed. The main reservoirs deliver their wind to numerous reservoirs in immediate connection with the pipes.

HERR JULIUS STOCKHAUSEN the well-known baritone-base, has been engaged by Mr. Mapleson, and is now on a tour with Mdlle. Tietjens, &c. We believe that Herr Stockhausen is also to sing during the operatic season at Covent Garden.

MUSICAL EXPRESSION.

BY THOMAS HASTINGS, MUS. DOC.

Expression belongs to composition as well as to execution. In composition, it is required, not only that pieces be regular and grammatical in their structure, but that they have a design so definite and so well elaborated as to accomplish its end. Like a public address, a piece of music must have an object, a method, and a manner which can be appreciated. It must have "a beginning, a middle, and an end." He who reasons illogically, talks loosely and at random, having nothing before his us than self-display, is simply a vain, impertinent fellow. He is like a clown who comes into a splendid parlour without an errand and who will soon be shown to the door.

So it is, or should be, with the composer. He must mean something, and must say what he means, and render himself reasonably intelligible. If he is dealing in mysteries for the initiated, let him give them suitable subjects for study and reflection; but when he composes for the benefit of the community at large, let him render himself intelligible, and not cater to the mere prejudices of a blind admiration. Pieces intended for amusement or display claim a wider latitude; and, though they often lose by it, they are not equally amenable to the canons of criticism. But the art, as already intimated, has been given to us for more important and beneficent purposes. For the accomplishment of these purposes, which are truly normal, our principle, just as in prose and poetry, must for ever hold good. It is as fundamental to art as to mental science and to literature. To speak for the purpose of showing off our own acquirements is one thing; to speak in self-forgetfulness, for the presentation of some important subject is quite another. This is a broad distinction, and one which in ordinary matters is universally appreciated.

Distinguished musicians in modern days, we are sorry to say, have lost immeasurably by so often setting this principle aside. Miriam was not engaged in Antichristian when she sounded her timbrel beyond the Red Sea, nor David when he sang and played before the ark of God in the solemn procession, nor Paul and Silas, who sang at midnight in the depths of a dungeon; and chief musicians on these ancient occasions, it may be presumed, were not labouring for self display.

But, it will be said, musicians have to gain their support; and must commend themselves to the public patronage as best they can. Yet, whether the blending of fundamental distinctions has not been the means at once of lessening the effecting power of music and the claims of a healthful patronage may well demand a doubt. Certain it is, that the religious and moral influence of music has not kept pace with the progress of artistic refinements.

A few oratorial examples may serve to illustrate our position.

The oratorio has been termed a musical feast. It embraces vocal and instrumental music in its multiplied varieties, combinations, and attractions. Its subject claims to be religious. Its topics are so for the most part; yet, in reality, it is intended for amusement and artistic display, and not at all for religious worship in the evangelical sense. Its design is histrionic, and even in this respect it often proves a failure.

Haydn's Creation, for instance, was for a long time exceedingly popular. The attraction of fine, rich, inimitable strains of music was irresistible. Who could presume to criticise such a genius, or point to suspected hints of any real deficiency? But the time has come when a just estimate can be formed. Considered merely as a drama, it is a splendid failure. The introductory page of unwonted discords reminds us of a musical chaos, from which we are glad to be relieved by the sudden introduction of harmonies which are to pass for the creation of light. His "Verdure clad," gives us sweet music in the person of a prima donna whose style and manner absorb attention. His is full of mimicries, which are fanciful enough. We perceive when large beasts spring to life, because they are heavy, treading at the bottom of the base staff; and the dove advertize themselves by cooing, as if already enjoying a comfortable inclosure. His choruses are animated and genial. He excites within us, while the piece is new, an abundance of what might be termed social good feeling and artistic enchantment. But whence derived legitimately from his Creation any exalted conceptions of creative energy, vastness, or awe-stricken sublimity? There is enough of free-hearted gladness, but it seems rather earthly than heavenly. We receive impressions of full-hearted joyousness, but not of true devotion. The people were, at all events, to be pleased; and the chief purpose was artistic. But why should sacred words be thus treated, even for splendid amusement? Is there no danger of desecrating tenderness and associations? And do not such things react upon the Christian mind against the real power and normal effect of musical appeals?

Handel, the father of English oratorios, whose style has become antiquated, has more depth of sentiment. He sometimes astonishes us by the sublimity and grandeur of his appeals, by the power of his descriptive imitations, and by the melting tenderness of his pathetic passages. But he has a mixed congregation before him, and must give pleasure to the different classes of hearers. So he affords amusement occasionally, by the queer leapings of frogs and the strange buzzings of "all manner of flies." He shows us the sun standing still, by a single long-drawn note of the violin on the letter A in sit, through several pages, resisting the united attacks of the orchestra to the full end. He represents us with a vocalist striving to outmaster the accompanying instrument in setting forth the trumpet alarm of the resurrection! He gives us a duet of singers vying with each in exclamations of universal triumph over the sting of death. He brings before us a double chorus of Jews and heathens, striving each other in the attitude of praise, while Dagon's party makes the sweetest music. And, amid all the masterly strains of his Messiah, we find in the chorus which he most prized for its skill, and deservedly so,* the Jews apparently, as in real life, striving with each other for the skilful utterance of the most awful blasphemies!

These were some of the follies and the sins of Handel, which have been too often and too successfully imitated by later composers. Witness the "Stop thief!" chorus, and the chorus, "Stone him to death!" through which biographers hope that he finally died a true Christian, was, in his years of activity, a man of profaneness. who, when angry, could "swear in five different languages successively." But he had wonderful powers of conception, and in his religious pieces, doubtless, often aimed to touch the true chords of evangelical piety. The productions of this sort, clothed as they are with histrionic associations, are important models for the study of expression. They are not perfect. They are by no means to be selected indiscriminately. Nor are they to be closely imitated. Nor yet is his antiquated phraseology to be used. But his masterly powers of conception and expression, which are still unrivalled in modern days, may well engage our earnest and critical attention. The follies and sins to which we have alluded were multiplied because of his blending of distinctions. He must often show off himself and his singers, even while our attention ought to be absorbed by the considerations presented in the topic before us.

Here was a fault of no trivial nature. If a Handel could so often commit it, we need not wonder at the greater temerity of his numberless successors.

We have now two classes of religious music, so-called, which in practice are continually confounded. We have what properly might be termed a concert style, for the exhibition of art; and a devotional style, which holds art in true subordination. Just in proportion as æsthetic motives prevail, the former will gain precedence of the latter. Artistic sentimentalities may become very pleasing to us in hours of devotion, but will they lead us in the direction of the Holy of Holies? That is the true question. Many good people, we fear, are too much under the influence of habit to catechize the real nature of enjoyments which fine music gives them. But, nevertheless, unmistakable signs of a declining interest in music which is purely devotional have become painfully manifest. This continual blending of distinctions which are fundamentally at variance will not answer. It may live out its day and do mischief, but the sooner we can be rid of it the better.

Let us not here be misunderstood. We are not offering principles which are newly discovered. We have nothing to hazard by the presentation of such criticisms as the above. They are fully authorised by the best writers in England and elsewhere, even among men who were sceptical in religious matters. Musical students should not be unmindful of the broad distinction we have been here considering. It is one which lies at the very basis of all true expression.

SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS.

The second of these concerts proved in many respects better than the first. There was greater unity in the orchestra; the programme was free from dance music; and a crowded audience gave éclat to the performance which reacts so pleasantly upon itself. We are glad to note these things; and hope that at last a successful effort is making to bring cheap orchestral music home to the doors of Londoners.

The concert began with the overture to Der Freyschütz, which was redemanded by a large portion of the audience, but not repeated. Mozart's Symphony in G minor opened the second part. So graceful and beautiful (yet, withal, so scientific and masterly) a work could not fail to arrest attention. Every movement was heard by the great crowd with an interest pleasant to witness; and, at the close, vigorous applause showed that the popular mind is not wholly below Mozart's level. The final overture was Nicolai's bustling prelude to The Merry Wives of Windsor. Herr Wilhelmj, a violinist, whom our readers will remember as having played, three years back, at the Monday Popular Concerts, made his rentrée on this occasion, and was well received. His performance of a very uninteresting concerto by Ferdinand David, and of Ernst's well-known Elegie, was marked by extraordinary executive ability (the octave playing being simply wonderful); and, also, by a luscious beauty of tone as rare as it was beautiful. We shall speak more at leisure of this violinist, and it must suffice, now, to add that his success was undoubted. The Elegie was encored. Madame Sinico, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Signor Foli supplied the vocal music, and each obtained favour with the audience. Mr. Reeves never sang better in his life. His rendering of "Adelaide," "My own, my guiding star," and "Tom Bowling," songs belonging to as many different schools, was perfect alike in taste and expression. The applause after each was tremendous; and persistent efforts were made to force encores for both the ballads. But Mr. Reeves was more persistent in his refusal, and won the event.

POOR Levassor, whose death was announced by the London papers on Tuesday, partly lived by holding us English up to ridicule. His favourite caricatures were the bluff John Bull and the French raw recruit, and he was equally felicitous in both. But we laughed just as heartily at one as at the other of his capital caricatures, as every frequenter of the St. James's Theatre can testify. Yet the French papers said on Monday night that the sensitive sons and daughters of "la perfide Albion" pelted him out of the playhouse when he attempted to appear on the stage, because he had dared to caricature them. This is how history is written by the Père-Loriquets of the French press. Among the French actors who played in London, Levassor was one of the most, if not absolutely the most, popular. Mr. Mitchell, of Bond Street, may, perhaps, think it worth while to correct this blunder, instigated by ill-nature. No one knows better than that enterprising gentleman what a large number of friends and well-wishers M. Levassor had in this country.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

THE second London Ballad Concert, given in St. James's Hall on Wednesday evening, was absent of some of the advertised attractions by the illness of Madame Goddard and Mr. Vernon Rigby. In place of the former, however, Mr. Wehli appeared and played some solos in a style which appeared to give infinite satisfaction to the audience. The other artists who took part in the concert were, for the most part, those who sang on the previous Wednesday. As regards the programme, nothing could have been better adapted to the tastes of ballad-lovers; and the enjoyment of those present—all, presumably, ballad-lovers—was of an uncommon order, judging by the applause bestowed. We need not enter into particulars with regard to what was done. Enough that songs old and new followed each other through a lengthy programme, that nobody had reason to complain of not receiving money's worth, and that everybody went away more than satisfied.

MADAME PUZZI gave the first of three musical evenings, at 24, Belgrave Square (by permission of the Marquis of Downshire), on the 10th inst. She was assisted by artists of eminence; among others, by Madame Sinico, Mdlle. Regan, MM. Ciabatta, Caravoglia, Foli, Paque, R. Blagrove, and Mattei. The programme was, as usual, on such occasions, of a varied character. Among the pieces encored, were "Qui stagno" (Signor Foli), "La dove amor" (Madame Sinico and Signor Foli), "Le Bearnois" Galop de Concert (Signor Mattei). Other successful performances were those of Madame Sinico, in Schira's exquisitely beautiful réverie, "Sogna!" and with violoncello obbligato by Mr. Paque; of Mr. Cobham in "Alice where art thou?"—and Mdlle. Regan in Rossini's "La Partenza." Mr. Ganz and Signor Pilotti acted as accompanists.

No songs are so well-known and popular as those of Scotland; and no interpreter of them is so well-known and popular as Mr. Kennedy. It would almost suffice, therefore, if we said, merely, that Mr. Kennedy gave three of his admired entertainments at Hanover Square Rooms on Friday week, on Monday, and on Tuesday. But since his last appearance in London the Scottish vocalist, par excellence, has been on his travels, and now prefaces each song with "anecdotes illustrative of the effect produced by our country's songs upon the native American, and the Scot abroad." Further, he gives between the parts "glimpses of Salt Lake City" (recollections of a visit to the Mormons). It is needless to say that both anecdotes and recollections are highly amusing, and help to pass away a most agreeable evening. Miss Kennedy accompanies the songs, and further diversifies the performance by playing a selection of reels, strathspeys, &c.

THE second concert of Madame Sainton's short farewell series was given in St. James's Hall on Friday night. As in the instance of its predecessor, the programme was well made out. Madame Sainton herself sang "By the simplicity of Venus' doves," Barnby's "Rainy Day," Levey's "Many a year ago," Claribel's "Children's Voices," and "Caller Herrin'." Loudly applauded after each, the artist obtained a deserved encore for "Children's Voices." In future Madame Sainton will be known as a composer rather than a singer; and it is pleasant to state, therefore, that one of her new songs, "Marjorie's Almanack," sung by Miss Edith Wynne, was encored, and another, "The Village Bridge," sung by Mr. L. Thomas, made a decidedly favourable impression. Both display not only good musicianship, but the power to seize upon and express the sentiment of the verses. Other ballads were given by Miss Wynne, Madame Ilata, Miss Angele, Mr. Byron (encored in "The Thorn"), Mr. Maybrick, and Mr. Thomas. Among the pieces sung by Mr. Barnby's Choir were Leslie's "My Love is fair," Barnby's "Sweet and Low," "A Spring Song" by Pinsuti, and, to go from small things to great, Mendelssohn's Psalm, "Judge me, O God." The instrumental soloists were Miss Agnes Zimmermann and Signor Piatti. The former played her own adaptation of Handel's second organ concerto, and Taubert's "La Campanella;" the latter his fantasia on Scotch airs, and, with Miss Zimmermann, Mendelssohn's variations for violoncello and piano. That both played well will be taken for granted. Mr. Thoulless was again the accompanist. We must not omit stating that Mr. H. Cummings was unfortunately prevented from taking his share of the programme by illness.

MR. DENISON NEWTON'S Annual Concert took place on the evening of the 12th inst, at St. George's Hall, and offered a novelty, in addition to a well sustained programme, in which he had the assistance of Madames Grace Corridale, Ellen Glanville, Fanny Armytage, Jessie Royd, and Adelaide Newton, as well as of Messrs. Banton, Chaplin Henry, T. Calvert (a recitation), Frank Thornton and Ellen Roberts, Harpist to H.R.H. the Prince of Wales. Mr. M. E. Walker, a young performer on the concertina, from Dublin, exhibited a refined musical ta-te, and, as in the case of Begoedi, caused a regret that the capabilities of the instrument are so inadequate to the depths of the performer's artistic feeling. The novelty above alluded to, was the production of Mr. D'Oyly Carte's lively opera di camera, Doctor Ambrosius, his secret; which, it will be remembered, was brought before the public, about eighteen months back, when the cast was sustained by the same company viz., Miss Royd (soprano), Miss A. Newton (contralto), Mr. Wallace Wells (tenor), Mr. D. Newton (baritone), and an amateur bass. As might have been anticipated from the long interval between the representations, there was much of the character of a "first time" about the performance, and some few lapses of memory; but there was success enough to warrant all concerned in following up the impression made, and pressing forward on the path made by Mr. Gilbert Rowe. Compact and concise works of their class, supported by a few clever actor vocalists, would soon take root in the public affections; and recommend themselves to managers also, as involving no outlay, or very little, in mounting them. Mr. D'Oyly Carte and his coadjutors may well be congratulated upon the agreeable innovation; and as a natural consequence, exhorted to search among our old-fashioned farces, for the material of another opera di camera without loss of time. The "situation" in the second act was most creditably developed, and called into action the dramatic powers of the troupe, so as to win great applause; and no small praise is due to the composer, who has so ably treated a situation which from its nature affords but little scope for music.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

The programme of the second concert of the year was as follows:—

PART I.

Quartet, in C major, Op. 59, No. 2	...	...	...	Beethoven.
Song, "Swallow, swallow"	...	...	...	Piatti.
Sonata, in C minor, Op. 25, pianoforte		...	...	Woelfl.

PART II.

Sonata, in A major, pianoforte and violoncello			...	W. S. Bennett.
Song, "Go not, happy day"	...	...	...	Seymour Egerton.
Quintet, in A major	...	...	...	Mozart.

Two of the instrumental pieces were introduced for the first time at these entertainments—the solo sonata of Woelfl, and the duet sonata of Professor Sterndale Bennett. The first-named, revived by Madame Arabella Goddard at one of her recitals in May last, was played by her with equal success on Monday night. Joseph Woelfl, born in 1772, was a contemporary and rival of some of the greatest pianists and composers of the early part of this century, including Clementi, Dussek, Steibelt, Cramer, Hummel, and Beethoven. So happy was he in improvization that he could maintain his ground in this respect, even in competition with Beethoven. Although Woelfl had not the rich and tactile genius of Dussek, he was a more thoroughly trained musician, and might easily have won higher and more permanent fame, as well as a happier condition, with greater prudence of worldly conduct. This eminent musician settled in London, where he died his life miserably in 1811 (?)—his resting-place being now unknown. Woelfl has left compositions in the most important forms of instrumental music; including orchestral symphonies, one of which (in G minor) was revived at the first concert of the Philharmonic Society, in March last. His chief works are for the pianoforte, on which instrument he was a performer of remarkable power. Perhaps the best of all his many solo sonatas is the one in C minor, revealing as it does consummate science, grandeur, and elevated sentiment. The introduction and fugue, the impulsive allegro, the sublime adagio, and the quaint final allegretto, are sufficient in themselves to stamp their composer as a remarkable man. The beautiful duet sonata of our most distinguished native musician is one of several works by the same hand, for the hearing of which we have been of late years indebted to Madame Goddard. Since the cessation of Professor Bennett's own exquisite performances in public, that lady alone has kept his admirable concertos in general remembrance by her occasional splendid performances. The Sonata in A met with the reception which might have been expected from an audience long accustomed to music of a highly intellectual order. Each of its four movements was received with manifest expressions of pleasure. The grace and refinement pervading the whole, the melodic fluency, and the ornate richness of the passage writing distributed between the two instruments, were alike recognized as emanating from the hand of a master. The minuet, with its alternativo, narrowly escaped an encore. How finely the work was played by Madame Arabella Goddard at the pianoforte, and Signor Piatti at the violoncello, the simple mention of those artists will imply. Of the "Rasoumowsky" quartet of Beethoven, symphonic in proportion and grandeur of style, and the clarionet quintet of Mozart—the one given for the fifteenth, the other for the eighteenth time—it is only necessary to say that the first was led by Herr Straus, and the last by Mr. Lazarus. Mr. L. Ries was second violin, and Mr. Zerbini, viola—the latter acting as accompanist in the absence of Mr. Benedict. Both the songs were finely sung by Mr. Santley, and both encored—the first, the composition of the renowned violoncellist, enhanced by his own obbligato accompaniment, the other the production of a distinguished amateur.

PROVINCIAL.

CARDIFF.—We read in the Cambria Daily Leader as follows:—

"The concert given for the opening of the new organ in Hannah Street Congregational Church was a success. The building was crowded, and the performance satisfactory. The principal vocalists were Miss Edmonds and Simester, Messrs. Hunt (Gloucester) and Grove (Newport). Miss Edmonds sang, with all her usual grace and finish, 'O had I Jubal's lyre' and Mr. Brinley Richards's 'Pilgrim's Path' (both encored); Miss Simester was obliged to repeat 'The marvellous work,' the solo in which she rendered in admirable style. The chorus, conducted by Mr. Lewis, won credit in Mozart's Twelfth Mass. The organ, erected by Mr. Vowles of Bristol, under the direction of Mr. Marychurch, possesses a fine tone."

MANCHESTER.—The Manchester Examiner and Times of Jan. 17 writes a flattering account of a recent concert given by Messrs. Forsyth at the Free Trade Hall, when the artists consisted of Mr. Mapleson's tour party. We extract as much from it as our space will allow:—

"A large audience assembled on Saturday evening, attracted by the names of Mdlle. Tietjens and other popular artists. This, we believe, was the first concert given in Manchester by Mr. Mapleson's company since the famous 'coalition,' which was to suspend operatic hostilities in London. Instead, however, of union, the present troupe suggests differences. We are reminded by the changes in the list of companions to Mdlle. Tietjens that desertions have taken place from the 'grand double company.' Some of the losses are of great importance. Madame Sinico and Mr. Santley are not to be readily replaced, and Signor Della Rocca cannot make us forget the tenors accustomed to travel with the party. In Signor Stockhausen, however, the directors of the Royal Italian Opera have secured an artist of the highest ability. He is now one of the finest singers before the public. His voice is a baritone of considerable range. Throughout the register his notes are even and beautiful. In everything he sang he proved himself a finished artist. His first performance at once created a favourable impression. This was increased in the trio from Rossini's Mass. Perhaps his greatest success was in the German Lieder, which were perfectly delivered. He was recalled several times."

We all remember Signor (formerly Herr) Stockhausen, who was last in England some dozen years ago, singing everywhere, with Madame Schumann and Herr Joachim. His reputation in Germany is very great. After speaking in very favourable terms of Signor Tito Mattei's pianoforte playing, the writer proceeds:—

"Mdlle. Tietjens was enthusiastically received, and sang with the feeling and taste that have for long made her so great a favourite. There is no trace of decay in the superb tones of her magnificent voice, which certainly was never heard to greater advantage. As an encore to 'L'Ardita' she sang 'Home, sweet Home,' in English, which, of course, created great enthusiasm."

The other singers were Mdlle. Vanzini, Mdlle. Scalchi, and Signor Tagliafico. The programme was of the usual "miscellaneous" character.

LEEDS.—Dr. Spark gave an organ recital on the 18th inst. in memory of the late Lefébure-Wély. The programme was headed by the following note:—

"Lefébure-Wély was one of the most brilliant and eminent of French organists and composers. For many years he held the post of organist at the Madeleine Church, in Paris, and subsequently left there to preside at the immense instrument erected by the famous Cavaillé Coll, in the Church of St. Sulpice. Upon the latter instrument he greatly distinguished himself by the beauty and brilliancy of his extemporaneous and other performances. In company with our own eminent organist, Mr. Henry Smart, I heard him play on this and other organs, with great effect, about two years ago. He possessed the true soul of music, and was a kind-hearted, generous gentleman. Only a few days ago he died suddenly at the foot of his beloved organ in St. Sulpice. Requiescat in pace! WM. SPARK."

All the pieces played were selected from Wély's compositions, save one—the Dead March in Saul.

HERTFORD.—A correspondent writes us as follows:—

"A concert was lately given in the Shire Hall, under the patronage of R. Dundale, Esq., M.P., which attracted a full audience, the artists engaged were Madame Marie D'Elise, Miss Alexandrina Dwight, Mr. Walter Reeves, as vocalists. Miss Amy Perry, Master W. Parker, R.A.M., Miss Patty Parker, and Messrs. Wilton and Parker, were the instrumentalists, under the direction of Mr. Lansdowne Cottell, R.A.M., and an instrumental quintet varied the programme, by playing some overtures and symphonies. Miss A. Dwight displayed a fine soprano voice in a waltz song, 'The Naiades,' and De Grom's 'I'm a Fishermaiden,' and with Marie D'Elise in the duet from Semiramide, created quite a sensation. Mr. W. Reeves gave, with his usual taste, 'Alice, where art thou?' and was encored. Master Parker, of the Royal Academy, was loudly applauded in two violin solos, as was Miss Perry in two pianoforte pieces. Mr. L. Cottell presided at the pianoforte, and the whole was a perfect success."

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

FRIEDEMANN BACH, WOELFL, AND BENNETT.

The Daily Telegraph of Tuesday spoke thus about the works recently played by Madame Arabella Goddard at the Monday Popular Concerts:—

"Yesterday se'nnight the new old thing was the fantasia by Wilhelm Friedemann Bach, played for the first time within the memory of man at one of those interesting recitals of pianoforte music given by Madame Goddard towards the end of last season. Not only is the work still in manuscript, but it is unknown to Herr Ritter, the industrious compiler of the lives of the junior members of the great Bach family. Though a century and a quarter old, the sonata—or fantasia, as it is styled, though it is for the most part constructed on as symmetrical a plan as an orthodox sonata—is in some respects as modern in character as though it had been written but yesterday; especially to be noted for the absence of all traces of age is the allegretto, as fresh and charming a movement as can be imagined. The sensation created when Madame Goddard first played the fantasia, in spite of a select afternoon audience, was naturally repeated to a much higher degree when it was listened to by the enthusiastic amateurs who on Monday nights throng into St. James's Hall. How the lady played need not be said; enough that the exquisitely limpid delicacy of her touch, and the luscious fulness of tone she contrives to draw so easily from the hard keyboard, were alike manifested in Friedemann Bach's recovered masterpiece. Another 'find' of Madame Goddard was brought forward by her last night—an introduction, fugue, and sonata in C minor by Woelfl, whose short-lived triumph has been succeeded by a period of undeserved neglect. The sonata played last night exhibits Woelfl's genius in the most striking light. The elaborate and throughout interesting fugue is introduced by a short adagio full of sustained dignity, the strong contrast between the two movements mutually heightening their effect. The long allegro which opens the sonata proper is remarkable for the art with which variety and unity are simultaneously preserved; the themes are sufficiently similar to give the movement a homogeneous character, while a constant diversity of treatment imparts increasing interest. The adagio is in our thinking, somewhat monotonous; but the rondo brings the sonata to a vigorous and satisfactory conclusion. Long as the work is, Madame Arabella Goddard firmly held the attention of her hearers until the very last note, when they broke out into hearty plaudits, and recalled her to the platform. She was joined by Signor Piatti in Professor Sterndale Bennett's little-known sonata in A major—a work, which, from beginning to end, is full of beauty and feeling. We will not dwell on each movement; but the minuetto must be specially noted, inasmuch as it displayed conspicuously the delicate fancy which is the author's chief characteristic, is charmingly written for both instruments, and won last night the most cordial applause. It is not the least of Madame Goddard's many claims to admiration and sympathy that she is the most devoted exponent of our gifted countryman's genius."

COVENT GARDEN THEATRE.

The pantomime, which first occupied the entire evening, is now preceded by a lever du rideau in the shape of M. Offenbach's pretty operetta, Luschen and Fritzchen. The toilet out of place and the buy-a-broom girl whose nausea form the title of the piece, and who are absolutely the only characters employed in it, are impersonated with much vivacity by Miss Julia Mathews and Mr. Wilford Morgan. The gentleman has a good voice, which he has learnt how to use, and the lady an unfailing fund of animal spirits, which, however, she would do well to husband somewhat in case of need. The operetta is of the slightest for so large a house as Covent Garden, but it served its purpose of introducing the glories of the pantomime. The story of The Yellow Dwarf is now told more quickly than on Boxing-night, and the unnecessary vocal pieces have been expunged, while the costumes, as artistic as they are sumptuous, and the admirable views of Steel Castle and its interiors, are as effective as ever. The harlequinade, moreover, has the peculiarity of being really amusing.

HENRY C. WATSON.

Our readers, to whom the name of Watson's Art Journal must be familiar, may have asked—Who is Watson? Here is an answer to the question taken from Frank Leslie's Illustrated Paper:—

"The most distinguished musical critic in this city, and perhaps in the United States, is Mr. Henry C. Watson. Born in London in 1820, Mr. Watson came of a distinctly musical race, and his father was a well-known composer in England. His talent as a boy was evinced as a vocalist, and wondrous things were predicted by the London critics of the day respecting the child-singer. These, however, were all to be falsified. He developed early a tendency to literature, which overcame his musical disposition, and thrust him upon the press. While yet merely a youth he came to New York—it was in 1840. At that time the press of the metropolis was an open field for strangers, and he almost immediately became known. Securing a position upon the New World, the popular weekly of that day, he made his début both as a critic and as a poet. In both these positions he achieved an instantaneous success. So pronounced, indeed, was this, that he received a liberal offer from the New York Albion, at that time the most critical paper published in this country. From this time, his progress has been steady and sure. Many writers upon music have appeared at his side, but they have not succeeded in obliterating his position as decidedly the leading journalist, who deals intelligibly as well as scientifically, with music in this country. At the same time, it is not simply as a musical critic that Mr. Watson has become known. Among numerous other journals with which he has been connected, he, in conjunction with Edgar A. Poe and Charles F. Briggs, started the Broadway Journal, while from 1856 to 1861 he was editorially connected with this paper. Discursively, however, upon almost every subject save politics, as his pen has been employed, it is principally as a musical critic that he will most probably be remembered, although as a writer of songs—both as poet and musician—he holds a distinct and most enviable position. While writing upon the Daily Tribune, some years since, his review of Meyerbeer's L'Africaine was translated both into French and German, as well as republished in England—a sufficiently rare honour, as connected with American criticism, to be worth chronicling. Indeed, his capability and wholesome energy as a reviewer have brought him so prominently before the public, that he has invariably been selected by his brethren, musical or literary, as their spokesman, upon all such occasions as the receptions of Jenny Lind, Sontag, Catherine Hayes, and other of the musical and vocal celebrities who have visited these shores. Among other of his labours, it may also be mentioned that he organized the great Mendelssohn Memorial Concert at Castle Garden, where an assemblage of at least 16,000 persons paid homage to the departed genius. Nor ought it to be forgotten, that it was by his unwearied exertion also, that the American Musical Fund Society, for the benefit of aged and impoverished musicians, was originally created. His address to Jenny Lind procured for it, from that estimable lady, the princely donation of 3,000 dols.

"Mr. Watson has recently assumed the position of art critic upon the Democrat. His trenchant and wholesome pen will undoubtedly make the mark through that sheet which it has invariably done upon every journal with which it has been connected. There are yet sufficient musical abuses to need the professional scalpel of a keen and determined critic, while there are numberless meritorious and struggling artists to whom a kindly word may be of almost priceless value. Knowing Henry C. Watson as thoroughly as we know him, we feel certain that he will not flinch from the use of the first, nor refrain from the utterance of the last."

ORATORIO CONCERTS.—On Thursday evening Mr. Barnby gave Haydn's Seasons, of which performance we must defer speaking till next week.

THE death of M. Levassor, the popular French actor, mimic, and vocalist, of the Palais Royal, Paris, and the St. James's Theatre, London, is announced—in his 63rd year.

A COUNTRY CRITIQUE.

Who is the musical reporter of the Knottingley Business Circular and General Advertiser? We should like to know him, because original genius is rare. Here is a specimen of his contributions, the publication of which must speedily result in our friend's removal to the metropolis:—

"On Thursday evening the Knottingley Town Hall was crowded by a respectable audience who realized perfect enjoyment in listening to the dulcet strains of Handel's immortal Messiah. No wonder that so exceptional a musical banquet brought together the most genteel audience that may be found in this district. There was present H. E. C. Childers, Esq., M.P., First Lord of the Admiralty, who was very warmly cheered. Before the oratorio was in action the audience had a chance to survey the room, which created one burst of admiration. The orchestra was thronged with nearly 100 performers, who made the place ring again with the most genuine music that ever was heard. The bâton was skilfully wielded by the celebrated Dr. Spark, to add one sentence to whose universally-recognized ability would be simply fulsome. We could not discover one blur throughout the evening. The music ran gloriously.—Those of our readers who did not hear four splendid vocalists, in the persons of Mdlle. Clara Doria, Miss Annie Anyon, Mr. George Perren, and Mr. G. Hall Rushforth, missed a prodigious treat. We could have sat, most comfortably, an hour longer to hear such singing.—Mdlle. Clarla Doria is possessed of a mellifluous voice, from which the gushing, rippling notes convinced her delighted hearers that she is a charming vocalist. It would be superfluous to comment on any particular piece that was sung; everything was rendered faultlessly.—Miss Anyon is the best contralto we have heard. Those who have heard her sing 'He was despised' will not soon forget that lady.—Mr. George Perren mightily pleased us. His rich voice, telling enunciation, admirable conception, and gigantic execution, lead us to see in him a great tenor. It is needless to record that comparisons are invidious; nevertheless, we have discovered in Mr. Perren a formidable rival in the much-admired Sims Reeves. —Mr. Rushforth is a first rate basso. He obtained a good share of deserved applause.—Dr. Spark has been highly eulogized for his selection of principals."

THE WALTZ OF THE PERIOD.

We really didn't know it, but there is a great deal in the waltz of the period. Here is what an American writer says about it:—

"The waltz of to-day is the passion poem of motion, and, written by first-rate composers, is a circle of beauty complete in its parts; not long, but rich; not solemn, but full of grace, dignity, and love. The very movement of three steps to the bar, one accented and two unaccented, gives a richocheting proportion that is indescribably graceful. Then, too, the intense accents of the modern school, the rainbow-archings of the violinism of the orchestra, the dazzling rapidity of the small flute, the clarionet, the cornet—all afford as large or larger scope for genius than much serious music, whose dignity is dulness and whose sacredness is the blind, stereotyped admiration of mere phantoms.

"The waltzes performed by Thomas's great orchestra, in his recent concerts here, were lyrics. They embraced instrumentation, melody, double counterpoint, imitations, progress, climax, and a general dramatic drift and scope, the world adorn the best symphonies.

"Exactly rhymed, each eight bars corresponding to four lines of poetry, and answering, by some mystic law, the symmetrical exigencies of the human heart, exposing, in rapid utterance, every shade of passion from turret to block tenors of the lowest—these great orchestral divisions, separately or partially or wholly combined, are all lavished with the exuberant hand of passionate and heroic genius in the construction of the waltz of to-day."

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAINE.—A new theatre will shortly be erected, exclusively for opera. The cost is estimated at five hundred thousand florins. Of this sum four hundred thousand florins have been already subscribed.

CARLSRUHE.—Madame Vlardot-Garcia's operetta, Der letzte Zauberer, is in rehearsal at the Grand-Ducal Theatre. The fair composer has added some new pieces, among them being a bravura air, for Mdlle. Murjahn, who will sustain the part of Stella.

CORFU.—After a lapse of eighteen years, Halévy's Guido et Ginevra has been very successfully revived. On the day following the first performance, the Duke created Madame Fichtner-Spohr (Ginevra) and Mdlle. Geri (Ricciarda) Ducal Chamber-Singers (Kammersangerinnen).

The Cubans manifest their admiration for opera artists in an odd way. Instead of throwing bouquets on the stage, they throw a young negro covered with bracelets of gold and jewelry. The black is, in fact, the favourite's jewel-casket.

The committee of the Liverpool Society of "Friends of Foreigners in Distress," have addressed a vote of thanks to Signor Arditi, "for the permission given them to play for the first time his new waltz. "The Lancashire Witches" (dedicated by permission to the Duchess of Manchester), at their grand ball." The waltz was greatly admired.

Several foreign papers are engaged in discussing the question of ecclesiastical music in churches, which may be brought before the Roman Council. Some advocate nothing but plain chant (Gregorian); others modern music and tonality; while others say—why not both?—and only banish the operatic airs and adaptations now so frequently used in Roman Catholic churches?

When the idea of learning to sing by note was first introduced into New England, something more than a hundred years ago, it was strongly opposed on religious grounds. It was regarded as nothing less than Popery in disguise. The New England Chronicle put it in this form:—"If the singing of songs by rule is allowed, the next thing will be to pray by rule and preach by rule, and then comes Popery." In the town of Braintree, several members of the church were expelled because they advocated singing by note.

While the Richings English Opera Company lost money by their operatic engagement at the Grand Operahouse, the Parepa-Rosa English Opera Company is coining money out West. Crowded and brilliant audiences have attended them everywhere, the receipts ranging per night sometimes as high as three thousand dollars. The fact is, that Parepa-Rosa is herself a dominant attraction, and, surrounded as she is by a company so admirable in every respect, it can hardly be a matter of surprise that crowded audiences are attracted wherever she appears. The arrival of Parepa-Rosa and her star company in New York is anxiously expected.

THE VENUS DE MEDICI.—No ancient statue is more celebrated than the Venus de Medici; indeed, it is looked on by connoisseurs as a perfect model of female loveliness. M. Bonomi has been taking the measure of this statue. He finds that, allowance being made for the stooping position, her height is about five feet and two inches. This is rather below the middle height. The foot of the Venus is exactly nine inches in length, rather more than one seventh of the whole height. Her waist is of course uncompressed, and of its natural size, and does not appear to be either too slender or too stout to be in perfect harmony with the figure of this famous goddess. The Venus de Medici was discovered in the villa of Hadriana in Tivoli.

All who take an interest in the elevation of the drama amongst us will regret to learn that Mr. Barry Sullivan has been obliged to give up his brilliant effort to uphold "the intellectual drama" at the Holborn Theatre. The season terminated on Saturday night, Mr. Sullivan's speculation, we regret to say, having cost him little less than the heavy sum of eight thousand pounds. The fact is, the English public care very little about the so-called intellectual drama now-a-days. The scene-painter, the burlesque writer, and actresses with petticoats as short as the Lord Chamberlain will permit, are the only means by which managers may hope to attract audiences large enough to pay. After all, this does not say very much for the nineteenth-century civilization of which we are all so proud.

OLD HOUSES.—I love old houses best for the sake of the odd closets and cupboards, and good thick walls that don't let the wind blow in, and little out-of-the-way polyangular rooms with great beams running across the ceiling—old heart of oak, that has outlasted half a score of generations—and chimney pieces with the date of the year carved above them, and huge fire-places that warmed the shins of Englishmen before the house of Hanover came over. These and delightful associations that ever made me feel, and think, and fall a-dreaming, are excited by old buildings—not absolute ruins, but in a state of decline. Even clipped yews interest me, and if I found one in any garden that should become mine, in the shape of a peacock, I should be as proud to keep his tail well spread as the man who first carved him.—Robert Southey.

William Spencer Jones, lessee of the Jarrow Theatre, was summoned before the South Shields magistrates for having assaulted an actress named Mary Montague. The complainant said when they were rehearsing a piece, Mrs. Jones (defendant's wife) asked her if she would take a certain part, but witness declined. On Mrs. Montague refusing, Mrs. Jones seized her by the hair and dragged her across the stage to where defendant was, and they then both endeavoured to throw her down some stairs. Mrs. Jones, failing in that, caught complainant in her arms and tossed her to Jones, saying, "Catch her." Whereupon Jones swung his arm round her, and getting her head in his left arm, commenced to batter her face with his fist. He struck her several blows under the chin, and knocked seven of her teeth out. She thought Jones was going to kill her, and "she gave them her all to God," saying, "Lord, take my soul." When defendant relaxed his hold of her, her jaws were locked, and it took her two hands before she could open her mouth, and when she did so several teeth fell out. Defendant had since run away. The magistrate considered the case a very bad one, and imposed a fine of £5 and costs, complainant to receive half of the fine (!!!)

For months past the organ of St. Joseph's Catholic Church has behaved in the most strange and unaccountable manner. Frequently, at the beginning of the service, when the organ struck a high key, the instrument would give forth a loud wail, and then prolonged the same or two, regardless of time or tune; and before the close of the service it sometimes happened that one or more of the low tones would take a similar "kink," and utter a sound similar to an engine blowing off steam, that could neither be stopped or regulated. The organist was immensely puzzled by these pranks, which were the more curious from the fact that they were intermittent—on some Sundays the instrument behaved with faultless propriety. At length, one recent Sunday, the organ let out such an unendurable "yowl," at a most impressive portion of the mass, that a thorough search was resolved on, when, wonderful to relate, it was found that an old cat had been blessed with a litter of kittens; she was wont to stretch herself and family across some of the interior cords or valves of the organ in such a manner as to produce the unearthly sounds referred to. The squatters were rejected with indignant promptitude, and blower induced to resume his post, and the organ being faithfully exercised, has behaved itself ever since.

We take the following from Watson's Art Journal:—

"The New York Tribune office can supply almost any class of sensation at the shortest notice, from an editor who steals the telegraphic news and insults Greeley, to an individual who shoots a defenceless man, or a musical critic who proposes to inflict corporal punishment upon artists in public. Editorial forging and stealing, though very rare, are second-hand sensations now: shooting down men is a popular amusement; but sticking pins into a lady in public, for not singing with sufficient abandon to move the æsthetic soul of the Tribune critic, must be accepted as a first-class novel sensation. The chaste and refined sentence in which this proposition to stick pins into Miss Sterling is to be found, must be read to be fully appreciated—it could only be published in the Tribune. It is understood that that powerful journal is about to establish a Regulator, to oversee the operahouses and concert-rooms, and inflict corporal punishment upon artists, in proportion to their crimes against the ears of the Tribune. If a tenor sings flat, he will be 'prodded' with a pitchfork; if a basso does not throw out his arms and pound his chest, he will be 'batted' over the head; if a soprano does not coax ears at the regulator, she will be 'nipped' on both arms; and if a contralto does not pump out expression, she will have 'pins stuck into her.' This delicate system of enforced education cannot fail to have its effect upon singers, and will probably give rise to a new style of criticism—a new Tribune-ism, indeed. Thus, 'Signor Stretto sang his grand aria with great ease and brilliancy; there was, however, an evident tendency to flatten on the upper notes, but a little judicious 'prodding' soon brought him up to the right pitch. Signor Large threw wonderful vocal tenderness into his charming ballata, but his action was tame and insipid, and we regret to say that he was 'batted.' Or, 'Signora Grupetti executed her arietta gracefully, and in very pure style; but as the expression could not be seen, a sharp application of 'pins' was necessary, after which an expression was very visible, indeed.' Thus it is that the Tribune leads the public opinion.

Some Parisian electrician has developed a brilliant idea: he electrifies singers just before they "go on," and they electrify the audience. They sing with spirit, energy, fire—all derived from the battery at so much per shock. Thus the work of a manager becomes simple: as he depends for light on the gas company, he will henceforth depend for the life and vigour of his operas on some new electrifying company, contracting to do the work nightly. Vocal genius will be laid down in wires, and turned on or off as required—the charge so much per Grisi-power. If the singers do not sing well, the gallery will know that it is the manager is stingy or has no funds; or that, through a dispute with the company, the electric supply is cut off. But if it is true—if brilliant singing can be bought for cash—why not extend the principle? Could not sublimity and startling eloquence be distributed in "mains" all over the land, with connecting pipes, and of course meters, to every town-hall and assembly room? could not even a hostess secure a certain amount of electricity to enliven a dull dinner party—just as now she secures table ornaments and flowers? Could not Exeter Hall, before all and above all, could not the nineteen thousand nine hundred and ninty-five dull pulpits in the land—the total number of pulpits being twenty thousand—be electrified, so that the plague of sleepy sermons might finally be exorcised?

Of Miss Nattie Sterling, whom some of our readers will remember, a New York paper says:—

"Miss Sterling went forth to be an earnest student, and it need hardly be said, ad one who could be so severe a self-critic, that she brought high intelligence to her studies. We have been privileged to hear her since her return, and we can conscientiously say, that her labour has been well rewarded, for the results have exceeded our expectations. Her voice was always fine; its body full, its resources of power very great, and she used it with considerable skill. But it was not equal; it had an abundance of rough energy which needed refining, toning down, and, in some parts, building up. Her impulse and enthusiasm were great, but these, too, needed that control which could only be accomplished by the self possession which perfect knowledge gives. Miss Sterling has achieved these ends. Her noble voice has attained its full power. It has been thoroughly equalized, and now presents that combination, of ample power, cultivated refinement, and passion controlled by intelligence. She has now, in addition to one of the finest voices ever heard, an artistic style and finish which fits her as well for the operatic stage as the concert-room, and we predict for her a brilliant success in both departments. We believe the stage to be her true mission, and if she follows out the true instincts of her nature. America will have had the honour of giving to the world two of the finest contraltos—Miss Adelaide Phillips and Miss Nettie Sterling—of the present century."

The subjoined flattering testimonial was presented to Mr. David Kennedy, the Scottish vocalist, during his professional visit to Canada:—

"To David Kennedy, Esq., Scottish Vocalist.

"Sir,—The members of the Caledonian Society of Montreal have observed with interest and satisfaction the unprecedented success which has attended you throughout the two years of your professional career, amongst the people inhabiting the northern portion of the American continent. It is peculiarly gratifying to us, as citizens of Montreal, that you should have selected our city as your starting point, a happy circumstance in itself, and one which, you have been pleased publicly to state, secured you elsewhere a cordial and enthusiastic reception. Your visit to America has been an event of national importance. You have taught the people of this new world what Scotland and her people are. They learn from you that Scotland is not the land of bigoted nor ascetic; that around the firesides of the followers of John Knox and the sons of the stubborn Covenanters children laughed, and young people made love, and old age told its stories, and sang its songs; stories which were worth telling, songs which were both sensible and sweet. We cannot refrain from expressing to you thus publicly our high opinion of your extraordinary gifts. Your compass of voice, so thoroughly disciplined, and your unparalleled power of coupling the sentiment of the melody with the sentiment of the song, never fail to awaken the most intense enthusiasm, and to elicit from your audiences unmistakable manifestations of their admiration; while your selections have invariably been such as to elevate and improve the musical taste and moral tone of the general public. And we have marked your open-handed and unostentatious generosity, manifested by the frequent occasions on which you have cheerfully given (as you and your accomplished daughter give to-night), your time and talents for the benefit of philanthropic institutions. And, lastly, we can all testify to the geniality of your nature, the charms of your manner and conversation, and the excellencies and virtues of your private life.

"It is in appreciation of all this, that your friends of the Caledonian Society desire now to present you with the gold medal, and a certificate of honorary membership in their society, together with this locket and chain for Miss Kennedy, which may serve to remind you, when sojourning in lands far awa', of the many warm-hearted friends you have left behind you in the City of Montreal.

"Signed on behalf of the Caledonian Society of Montreal,

"David Cunningham, President.
"William McRobie, Secretary."

THEN AND NOW.

Eternal Rome! who sat on seven hills,
Big with vast conquest and ambition's lust,
Sent forth her legions, thick as Egypt's ills,
To grind opposing nations to the dust.

And Rome still stands, immortal and sublime,
Nor yet a city where ye may not find
Her legions now, as in the ancient time;
They still go forth, their mission still to grind!

To Shirley Brooks, Esq. Cuddley Pidding.

Constantinople.—Robert le Diable and La Muette have been produced with extraordinary success.

Moscow.—Rossini's Messe Solennelle was performed for the benefit of the Conservatory. The Sisters Marchisio were greatly applauded in it.

Warsaw.—M. Moniuszko lately gave his annual concert, the programme of which included the first part of his popular work, Walma, and a new ballad for orchestra, chorus, and solo-singers, founded on Mickiewicz's Pani-Twardowski (the Polish Faust). Reversing the usual order of things, however, M. Moniuszko makes Mephistopheles a tenor, and Twardowski (Faust) a bass.

Aix-la-Chapelle.—In consideration of the fact that the hundredth anniversary of Beethoven's birth falls during the present year, it has been decided that, at the forthcoming Musical Festival to be held in this town at Whitsuntide, the programme of the first day shall be devoted entirely, the programmes of the other two days shall be devoted preponderatingly, to the works of the great master.

Dresden.—On the 16th inst., Herr Joseph Tichatschek celebrated the fortieth anniversary of his artistic career. He began in 1830 as a chorister at the Kaerthnerthor-Theater, Vienna. In 1838, he was engaged at the Theatre Royal in this capital, and has remained a member of that institution ever since.

Darmstadt.—A new opera, Theodor Körner, music by Herr W. Welsheimer, words by Luise Otto, was to have been produced on New Year's Day, a sort of προοιμιον to it, Heinrich lasst Brücken, having been previously brought out with success in Leipsic and Düsseldorf. Scenery had been painted, new and splendid costumes made, and all was ready, when the Grand-Duke sent to say he desired to read the libretto. An hour afterwards, he forwarded a message to the management, intimating that the opera could not possibly be produced in Darmstadt. To all prayers and entreaties, his Highness replied that he himself felt sorry, but that, if the composer, Herr Welsheimer, was not a Russian, he could not fail to perceive that the production of his opera was entirely out of the question, as the story was based upon a disgraceful episode in the German War of Deliverance, when the Hessians were opposed to the volunteers commanded by Lützow.

Operatic Activity.—Our facetious contemporary, Il Trovatore, gives the following list of new operas written by Italian composers, or by foreign composers for Italian theatres, during the year 1869. 1. Maria, semi-grand, Count Sampieri, Teatro Contavalli, Bologna; 2. Chatterton, serious, Signor Mancini; Cingoli; 3. Piccolino, serious, Count Cavalcabò, Teatro Sociale, Rovigo; 4. Sullia a Roma, comic, Fred. "'EFFIE'S BRIDAL.' Ballad by 'Philomele.' This pleasing and effective ballad for a contralto voice is so perfectly well written that its fair composer need not have concealed her identity, and we should hope that the success of 'Effie's Bridal' will induce 'Philomele' to lift off the veil.

"SHE NEVER CAN BE MINE."

Sung with distinguished success by Mr. DAVID LAMBERT.

Composed by W. ALLAN SMAITH.

Price 3s.

"The new song, 'She never can be mine,' by Smaith, is an excellent composition, and likely to become a popular favourite. In the hands of so accomplished and finished a singer as Mr. David Lambert, for whom the song was expressly written, the beauties and effects of the song were well and admirably displayed. Mr. Lambert was in magnificent voice, and added much to the popularity and fame of 'She never can be mine,' which he sang with such taste and musical feeling as to win a most enthusiastic encore, and finally retired from the platform amidst a storm of applause."—South Durham Mercury.

A COMEDY IN FIVE ACTS.

Being an English version* of MM. MELILHAC and HALÉVY'S Frou-frou, written by H. SUTHERLAND EDWARDS.

CHARACTERS.

Royston.	Toole.	Louise.
Henry Vivian.	Zanetto.	Lady Lorimer.
Lord Walsingham.	George Vivian (a child).	Susan.
Sir John Lorimer.	Isabel.	A Governess.

TIME—Present Day.

ACT I.

Elmtree Park, Royston's country seat. Scene represents a drawing-room, opening, by two doors at the back, on to a terrace, leading to a park. Between the two doors a table. Work-table L., sofa R.

Susan discovered arranging the furniture. Suddenly, hearing a noise, stops and listens, turning her head towards the back of the stage, and then walking to door on R.

Susan. Who can this be? (Looks through the door.) Miss Isabel and Lord Walsingham, galloping like mad. Miss Isabel is first—No, he can't overtake her—it is no use his whipping his horse like that.—Ah! here she is.

Enter Isabel in a riding habit, very much out of breath.

Walsingham. Yes, I am beaten.

Isabel (scarcely able to speak). Presently, Susan! I am too tired to dress now.

Isabel. I've won, I've won! (She runs to the table at the back, and takes up a newspaper.) (Enter Lord Walsingham.) Here is the Times. (Gives Mary her riding whip and sinks down on the sofa. [Exit Susan.

Walsingham. I am beaten, I acknowledge it.

Isabel. You speak as if you were not quite certain? Did I not fairly win? (Folds the newspaper into the shape of a fan, and fans herself with it.)

Walsingham. You won and I lost; but after all I gained by losing.

Isabel. How so?

Walsingham. Because I gained the pleasure of seeing you riding before me, which I naturally should have missed if I had allowed myself to come in first. You have a delightful little figure, and sit your horse charmingly.

Isabel. That's pretty, very pretty!

Walsingham. No, it's you who are pretty—very pretty—and a great deal more than very pretty; and when you jumped the ditch, your habit flew up, and I saw a foot that was also very pretty, and so very, very small!

Isabel. What do you mean?

Walsingham. I mean that you have a very little foot, and so you have—just look. (He looks at Isabel's foot, which peeps out from beneath the skirt of her habit.)

Isabel. Oh! (draws in her foot.)

Walsingham. Deny it if you can.

Isabel. Please behave yourself. Be serious.

Walsingham. You choose a nice day for giving me that advice when I have got something so prodigiously serious to say to you that I really (laughing) don't know how to begin.

Isabel (also laughing). Is it so serious as all that?

Walsingham. You will see——

Isabel (rising). Well, presently. Because if you have something very serious to say, I, for my part, have something very serious to do—I have to dress for dinner.

Walsingham. I wonder whether you have a heart, Isabel?

Isabel. Isabel, indeed? How dare you? Ah, here's papa.

Enter Royston and Lady Lorimer also in a riding habit.

Royston. What is the meaning of this, Isabel? what is the meaning of your galloping off in that wild style, and leaving us behind together?—Not that I complain of it.

Lady Lorimer. I should think not.

Isabel. I will tell you, papa. It was a bet, which of us two, Lord Walsingham or myself, should get to the house first, come into the room and take up the Times newspaper from the table. And I won.

Royston (taking the paper from her hands). And a nice condition the paper is in!

Isabel. Well, papa, you know you never read it.

Royston. And the clitch I told you particularly not to jump?

Isabel. Come, papa, don't scold me; it only hurts you. Besides, if I was imprudent I have been well punished for it. I want to speak to you (she takes his arm). I have something to tell you about Lord Walsingham. He has been saying such things to me——

* This version is sanctioned by the authors and published with their approval, in conformity with the requirements of the International Copyright Act of 1852 (signed H. MEILHAC, LUDOVIC HALÉVY. Paris, January 26, 1870).

Royston. What?

Walsingham. I said nothing, Mr. Royston.

Isabel. Well, papa shall hear. A girl who is properly brought up tells everything to her father, doesn't she, papa? He said I had no heart, papa, and called me Isabel. (Exit with her father, R.

Walsingham (following them to the door). She encouraged me, Mr. Royston. Your daughter encouraged me.

Lady L. Ah, Lord Walsingham, Lord Walsingham!

Walsingham. What have I done?

Lady L. I have known you now for nearly four years, and if I were to tell you what you really are—— Walsingham. What I am, Lady Lorimer?

Lady L. Yes.

Walsingham. A poor devil who is dying of love for you.

Lady L. For the last four years!

Walsingham. For the last four years without ceasing.

Lady L. (rising). In the meanwhile you have been here two days, and during the whole of these two days you have thought of nothing but Isabel.

Walsingham. It's a manœuvre of mine, Lady Lorimer. Don't mention it, but it's a manœuvre.

Lady L. To make me jealous?

Walsingham. Yes. But seriously, it is what we must all come to at last, end she is a charming little girl.

Lady L. I don't understand.

Walsingham. There is no true happiness except in the married state. That is the conclusion I have arrived at.

Lady L. (bursting with laughter). What do you say?

Walsingham. I say there is no true happiness——

Lady L. You mean that you are going to take a wife? (Walsingham inclines his head.) And who is the fortunate lady.

Walsingham. We have already named her, and the day she and I get married a charming marriage it will be.

Lady L. Music by Offenbach?

Walsingham. But why not? It will be a suitable match in all respects. My estate, which you can see without a telescope from the window, joins her father's on one side, as Vivian's joins it on the other. Royston must have been impelled by destiny when, a year ago, with two marriageable daughters, he bought this place just between the habitations of two single men; and you may depend upon it neither Vivian nor myself will fight against the decrees of fate. We shall both get married; and what a sight, what an interesting, touching sight it will be if we both get married the same day. Marriage No. 1: Henry Vivian, Esq., of Lyncombe House, to Louisa, eldest daughter of Jonathan Royston, Esq., of Elmtree Park. Music by Haydn — an admirable union of wisdom and prudence. Marriage No. 2: Percy Mountjohn Fitzfotheringay, Lord Walsingham, of Walsingham Castle, to Isabel, second daughter of Jonathan Royston, Esq.—an admirable union of precisely the contrary.

Lady L. Do you know what you are talking about? What reason have you for supposing that Mr. Vivian is in love with Louisa, or that he has any intention of marrying her?

Walsingham. What makes me think so?

Lady L. Yes.

Walsingham. Well, if not, why should he, who never comes into the country when he can possibly help it—why should he this autumn spend two entire months at Lyncombe House? If he were not in love with Louisa and wanted to marry her, why should he come here day after day to see her?

Lady L. (rising). Is that all you know about it? I begin to think you really are in love!

Walsingham. What do you mean?

Lady L. Of course it is not impossible that Louisa may appreciate Mr. Vivian's numerous good qualities——

Walsingham. Well, then, it is quite evident——

Lady L. Yes, very evident indeed! You are in love! There is no doubt about it. You are in love, Lord Walsingham. (Curtsies to him, and exit laughing.)

Enter Sir John L. from the back, L.

Sir John Lorimer. Where is my wife? She promised to wait for me. I thought she was here with you.

Walsingham. So she was, and if I could have prevailed upon her to stay I assure you that she would be here now.

Sir John L. I quite believe you, Walsingham. Lady Lorimer is a charming woman, only she is rather unimpressionable. But you know that as well as any one.

Walsingham. I? How am I to know it?

Sir John L. (sitting down). And you are not the only one. Dear me, what a number of men have made love to Lady Lorimer! I have watched them at it.

Walsingham. With interest?

Sir John L. No, with comparsion. Poor devils! You young'—

Walsingham. I? Why, I never once——

Sir John L. You did—on three distinct occasions. You have made three separate attempts. First of all, as a matter of course, the day I introduced you. Secondly, two years afterwards at a military ball. You were in uniform, and the uniform of a hussar is, I admit, to some women irresistible—but not to Lady Lorimer. The third attempt was made here, in this very house, two days ago, and because she would have nothing to say to you, you suddenly began to make love to Ettie Isabel.

Walsingham. You have been consulting a somnambulist.

Sir John L. You were quite right to give it up. There is nothing to be done with Lady Lorimer. I made my mind up on that point long ago. (Rises.) Here, you see, is a temperament which has its good as well as its bad side. It is not all I could desire for my own sake, but it is very re-assuring in regard to others.

Walsingham (rising). I quite understand that.

Enter Servant.

Servant. Some letters. (Gives eight or ten letters.)

Sir John L. Are they for me? Lady Lorimer, Lady Lorimer—all for Lady Lorimer. Poor fellows, poor fellows! [Exit L.

Enter Royston, R.

Royston. Oh, you are still here. I am glad of it; I want to speak to you.

Walsingham. I want to speak to you also.

Royston. Once for all I must have an explanation with you.

Walsingham. That is just what I was going to observe.

Royston. What were you saying just now to Isabel?

Walsingham. Nothing that a young lady ought not to hear.

Royston. Not in your opinion!

Walsingham. Exactly so. Besides, even if I did go a little too far, what can it matter when my intentions are strictly honourable?

Royston. What?

Walsingham. When I am on the point of proposing to her.

Royston. Proposing to her! You?

Walsingham. Why not?

Royston. What can you be dreaming of?

Walsingham. I can assure you, Mr. Royston, that I never was more serious in the whole course of my life.

Royston. Even that is not saying much. Look here, Walsingham. I am very fond of you. We have been a good deal to the opera together—we have supped together a good deal. You eat me out with Rose, I eat you out with Nelly.

Walsingham. As for that——

Royston. What! I did not eat you out with Nelly?

Walsingham. Well, if it pleases you to say so——

Royston (emphatically). I did not eat you out with Nelly?

Walsingham. Well, then, you did. Of course when I am going to ask you something of the highest importance I should not be likely to contradict you.

Royston. I eat you out with Nelly, and I like you immensely; but as for giving you my daughter—never as long as I live!

Walsingham. Then you are wrong. I should think of nothing but her happiness, and I could make her very happy. I am sure of it. Come, you must give your consent.

Royston. Never. Lord Walsingham.

Walsingham. But why not, when you say yourself that you have so much regard for me?

Royston. It is precisely because I like you, or rather, for the very reasons which make me like you, that I can't listen to your proposition. (Enter Louisa.) Oh, you have just come in time. You had better speak to Louisa about it. See what she will say.

Louisa (to Walsingham). Is it all about?

Walsingham. Oh, it is no use trying to frighten me.

Royston. Is it not perfectly understood that whatever wisdom belongs to the Royston family is centred in this little brain—that whenever anything serious has to be discussed, it is Louisa who must be consulted?

Louisa. Well?

Walsingham. Well, I will tell you what it is. I have just made a formal proposition to Mr. Royston for the hand of your sister Isabel.

Louisa (laughing with laughter). Oh!

Walsingham. I am waiting your reply.

Louisa. My reply is that you are not dressed, and that the same thing will happen to-day that happened yesterday—you will be late for dinner.

Royston. There. You had better take the hint. I must go and dress also.

Walsingham. Of course, if there is a dead set made against me——

Louisa. Go and dress!

Walsingham. Not until you have given every single reason you can think of for objecting to me.

Louisa. If you wait for that you will be late for dinner.

Enter Servant from the back, R.

Servant. Mr. Vivian.

Enter Vivian.

Vivian. How do you do?

Louisa. Did you meet papa?

Vivian. Just this moment. (To Walsingham.) How are you, Percy.

Walsingham. Quite well, thank you (with a gloomy air). I say quite well but if you only knew how they treat me in this house!

Louisa. You will never be ready for dinner.

Walsingham (looking at Louisa, who laughs in reply). I will go this moment, Miss Royston, this very moment. [Exit L.

Louisa. How late you are to-day! (She points to a chair. He sits down.)

Vivian. I think it arises from this: I left home rather earlier than usual.

Louisa (laughing). You are too clever for me.

Vivian. Well, I will explain to you. (Sits down.) I got on horseback, and started at a gallop, so anxious I was to get here soon. However, when I was within about a hundred yards' distance of the avenue, I pulled up, turned my horse's head, and rode off in another direction. Three times I came back to the avenue, and three times I hesitated, and went away again. At last I behaved like a coward who is determined, for once in his life, to be brave. I rode on without looking where I was going, and here I am.

Louisa (still laughing, but with some emotion). But what was the meaning of this hesitation?

Vivian. The reason was this: I had made up my mind to say, this very day, something that has been weighing upon my heart for the last three months. That is why I was so nervous when I came in, and why even now——

Louisa. But if what you have to say is so very serious——

Vivian. It is indeed.

Louisa. Perhaps it would be better to wait a little.

Vivian. No, no, this very day. I have made up my mind. But before I say one word I must reflect for a moment on the kindness you have invariably shown me.

Louisa. Of course I have. But would it not be much better. You must understand that, if you hesitate, it is quite natural that I, on my part——

Vivian. No, I will speak at once. I have your father's permission——

Louisa. Oh. if you have papa's permission.

Vivian. Ha not only gave me his permission, he told me it was absolutely necessary, in the first place, to speak to you.

Louisa. Well then?

Vivian. You cannot guess? I have long been attached——

Louisa. You have long been attached?

Vivian. I am, in fact, desperately in love—with your sister, Isabel.

Louisa. Isabel!

Vivian. Were you not aware of it?

Louisa. No—was not aware of it.

Vivian (without looking at Louisa, and as if speaking to himself). And I fancied everyone must have noticed it!

Louisa. You wish to marry Isabel.

Vivian. Yes, and in making that confession, I rely on the friendship and kindness which you have so constant'y shown me. There is no one in the world in whom I have so much confidence as in you. Tell me what you think of my avowal—tell me rather, at once, if you see no objection to my marrying your sister.

Louisa (aside). Isabel!

Vivian. You do not answer.

Louisa. I know what you say. You love Isabel and you ask me——

Vivian. Whether you think I should make her a good husband.

Louisa (rising). Certainly. I said nothing, did I, to make you imagine that I had the least objection?

Vivian. You said nothing, but——

Louisa. As far as I am concerned, yes—yes, without doubt.

Vivian. You will take my part, then?

Louisa. I will, for I know no one so good, so worthy in all respects.

Vivian (rising, and seizing her hands, which she withdraws, as though he were hurting her). Thank you, oh! thank you.

Louisa (slowly, and looking at Vivian with a melancholy smile). At first I was rather startled. I did not understand you all at once. Now I am a little more accustomed to the idea. In fact, the more I reflect on it the more I perceive that you are the very husband I should have chosen for Isabel. I have often thought of her getting married and I confess that I have thought of it with alarm. With all my love and esteem for her, her frivolity sometimes frightens me.

Vivian. Oh!

Louisa. And it never occurred to me till now that to counteract this danger the best thing that could possibly happen to Isabel would be to marry a man like you. (She sits down on the sofa.)

Vivian. Do not let us blame her for what you call her frivolity, for, to tell the truth, it is partly for that very frivolity that I love her so much. I must try to cure her of it, though—but gently, very gently.

Louisa How fond you are of her!

Vivian. Indeed I am.

Louisa. But what made you come and speak to me about it?
Vivian. Your father told me to.
Louisa. Oh, yes! Well, now you have said all you had to say and I have answered you. Is there anything more?
Vivian. Yes, I have something more to ask. (Sits down.)
Louisa. What is it?
Vivian (as if asking her a great favour). You must — you must speak to her for me.
Louisa. Ah!
Vivian. If I were to attempt to speak to her myself I know what would happen. I should get frightened and leave the room. Or if I did summon up courage that would be still worse, perhaps. She would begin to laugh, and then I don't know what I should do. No, I would much rather that you would speak to her. Say all you fairly can in my favour, and if you go a point beyond it will do no harm. Only don't say too much, please, about my serious qualities. That is the dangerous point, I know. Tell her, that in spite of my solemn demeanour, in spite of my awkward manner, I love her as ardently and far more devotedly than any of the harebrained young men who are always running after her. (Rising.) Ah! if you only knew how often I have envied Wasingham!—Tell Isabel not to think too much of the outward husk, and that it is not my fault if, by some unlucky fatality, those who love the most sincerely are almost always the ones who are the least able to talk of love.
Louisa (rising). Yes, I will indeed.
Vivian. You will speak to her?
Louisa. Yes.
Vivian. When?
Louisa. Directly I see her. Almost immediately; before dinner.
Vivian (with emotion). Immediately?
Louisa. You do not wish me to?
Vivian. Yes, yes; only not before me—not before me, please.
Louisa. Certainly not. But what will you do in the meanwhile?
Vivian. I will tell you what. I will go into the garden and walk up and down before the window. If she says Yes, you need only make a sign. If she says No——
Louisa. If she says No?
Vivian. I shall get on horseback and ride home. That is all.
Louisa (sadly). That is all?
Vivian. Precisely. Yes or No. My whole life depends on that.

Enter Isabel, dressed for dinner. She carries a bracelet in her hand.

Isabel. Louisa, just fasten that.
Louisa. What?
Isabel. This bracelet. I can't manage it (Louisa fastens the bracelet.) Good heavens! what is the matter with you? How your hand shakes. How do you do, Mr. Vivian. (While Louisa fastens the bracelet on her left hand she gives her right hand to Vivian.)
Vivian. I hope you are quite well.
Isabel. And you are trembling too? (Vivian and Louisa look at one another.) What, both of you? Indeed, indeed! what does all this mean?
Louisa. Well, Mr. Vivian, as it is impossible for you to remain——
Vivian. I must beat a retreat.
Isabel. Really!
Louisa. Go and take a walk.
Vivian. —— I will go and take a walk. [Exit at back, L.
Isabel. My dear Louisa, how sorry I am——
Louisa. Sorry?
Isabel. Yes, to have rushed in like that, and spoiled your tête-à-tête. But why did he go away? You would have seen how I should have managed it. I should have just walked round the room, picked up something or other off the table, and in a moment you would have lost sight of me.
Louisa. On the contrary, you arrived just in time. For we were speaking of you as you came in.
Isabel. Of me?
Louisa. Mr. Vivian has proposed for you.
Isabel. What are you talking about?
Louisa. I say that Mr. Vivian has proposed for you. He had spoken to papa before, and papa, knowing how much I love you, my dear Isabel, asked him to come and speak to me.
Isabel. Mr. Vivian has proposed for me!
Louisa. He has.
Isabel. Impossible! you must make a mistake.
Louisa. Not in the least.
Isabel. Then he makes a mistake. He is in love with you!
Louisa. He is not aware of it. It is you he wishes to marry.
Isabel (greatly astonished). Ah!
Louisa. He just told me, and he entreated me to tell you, and—— Isabel. And——
Louisa. And he is waiting outside for your answer.
Isabel. Indeed! what, directly? Without giving me time to breathe? And you say that he has already spoken to papa!
Louisa. Certainly he has.
Isabel. How cunning of papa. He would not give him an answer; he thought he would leave it all to you.
Louisa. Papa could not give him an answer; that must depend upon you.
Isabel. Upon me?
Louisa. Upon you, of course.
Isabel. It is too serious an affair for me. I have always said to myself that when the time came to talk about my getting married, I should go to my dear Louisa, who is a sensible person, and beg her——
Louisa. But really——
Isabel. I am like papa—I throw all the burden on you. Decide for me. I will do whatever you tell me.
Louisa. If that is the case, I advise you——
Isabel. You advise me?
Louisa. I advise you to accept him.
Isabel. You mean what you are saying?
Louisa. Certainly I do. Everyone knows that Mr. Vivian is a man of the highest qualities.
Isabel. Oh! I know that he has plenty of good qualities, perhaps rather too many.
Louisa. How so?
Isabel. I render full justice to Mr. Vivian. I agree with you that he is a man whom it is almost impossible to refuse. I know what a high opinion everyone has of him—what do they say he will be one of these days?
Louisa. I don't know. A minister somewhere, an ambassador.
Isabel. And I should be an ambassadress!——However, if I render justice to him I must also render justice to myself. I know what faults I have, and they seem to me of the very kind that would just suit a man like Mr. Vivian, if his object in getting married is to have a wife who will make him thoroughly wretched. (Louisa makes a gesture of dissent.) You think he will be able to correct them? I doubt it. I have always been spoiled, first by papa, then by you—above all by you. I am used to it now, and I don't think I could do without it.
Louisa. He is devoted to you.
Isabel. Are you sure?
Louisa. Did you not see him just this moment?
Isabel. He certainly, just this moment, seemed rather upset——He is in love with me, then, is he? It is certainly a strange idea!
Louisa (getting excited in spite of herself). And you think it is nothing to be loved by a man like him? You think nothing of seeing him tremble and stammer before you, like a child, until he scarcely knows what he is saying?
Isabel (watching her sister). I don't think I am mistaken.
Louisa (more and more excited). I think if I were asked what man I loved best I should feel happy and proud at being able to reply: look on all sides until you see one who is superior to all around him, that is the man I love best!
Isabel. So superior as all that?
Louisa. Decidedly.
Isabel. Do you know one thing, my dear Louisa?
Louisa. What?
Isabel. I shall not marry Mr. Vivian.
Louisa. Why not?
Isabel. Because hitherto I have always fancied that you were in love with him, and at this moment I am not at all sure——
Louisa. If I were in love with him should I advise you to marry him?
Isabel. How can one be certain of anything with you? Don't I know, Louisa, that you are quite capable of sacrificing yourself for me and revelling in the very sacrifice?
Louisa. Now, Isabel, you are going too far. I have certainly a very great affection for you; but, great as that affection may be, I certainly would not, if I were in love with a man, allow him——
Isabel (not knowing what to think). You mean it?
Louisa (with assumed gaiety). I do; and really if that is your only objection——
Isabel. Oh! as for objections, I could think of plenty. Whether they are worth anything is another question; I can't say. However, being in doubt, I will do what I have always done. Louisa—place myself in your hands. Act for me. Be prudent or imprudent: it is your affair. Shall I accept or refuse? (Louisa is about to speak.) No, don't be too quick. Let me tell you to be serious this time, and, before you make up your mind, think of everything.
Louisa. I have thought of everything.
Isabel. And what is your opinion?
Louisa. My opinion is that Mr. Vivian will be too happy with you, for you not to be happy with him.
Isabel. Then I had better accept?
Louisa. You had better accept.

Enter Royston.

Royston (to Louisa). Well, did you speak to her?
Louisa. Yes.
Royston. And?——
Louisa. She accepts.

Royston (kissing Isabel). Ah, you are a good girl.
Isabel. Then you are pleased, papa?
Royston. Delighted! Besides, I can now give a decided answer to our dear friend Lord Walsingham.
Isabel. What?
Royston (laughing). Don't you know that he actually proposed for you this morning? Fancy Walsingham a married man.
Louisa (laughing). Yes, fancy Walsingham making you an offer.
Isabel (to her father). And it makes you laugh? (To Louisa). And you also. I dare say if he had spoken to me about it I should have laughed more than both of you together. But who can tell? It would have been folly; but perhaps it would have been the wisest thing all the same. However, it's decided now.
Royston. But——
Isabel. If it is decided, let us say no more about it—now I am an ambassadress.
Royston. Then I had better call Vivian in—the poor fellow is walking up and down in a terrible state of agitation.
Isabel. Out in the garden?
Royston (pointing to the back of the stage, L.). Yes, there he is.
Isabel (with some emotion). Oh, call him in.
Royston (going to the back of the stage). Vivian, I say, come here a moment, I have something to tell you.
Enter Walsingham in evening-dress, with an enormous camelia in his button-hole.
Walsingham. You see I am not late for dinner after all (observing that every one is silent). What is the matter here? Something has happened?
Enter Vivian.
Louisa (to Vivian). You must stop to dinner, Mr. Vivian—at Isabel's invitation.
Isabel (giving him her hand). Yes, you must stay.
Vivian (kissing Isabel's hand). Ah—if you only knew how much——
Isabel. Yes, yes, I know——
Walsingham (aside to Royston). And what about me?
Royston (aside to Walsingham). No. You must not carry the joke too far. Besides, she is engaged now; it's all settled.
Walsingham. Impossible! Now, they never will believe that I am in earnest.
Enter Sir John and Lady Lorimer.
Walsingham. Ah! Lady Lorimer, what a charming dress!
Lady L. (aside to Walsingham). What has happened?
Walsingham. It seems that the most beautiful eyes are also the sharpest.
Lady L. Which, being interpreted, means——
Walsingham. That you saw long ago, what I could not see at all.
Lady L. (walking round the room). Ah! Vivian and Isabel.
Walsingham. Yes.
Lady L. Is it all settled?
Walsingham. It looks like it. Whose music is this?
Lady L. Music of the future! I shall be curious to see what comes of it.
Walsingham. In the meanwhile you know that I am devoted to you.
Sir John L. (walking gently towards Walsingham). Fourth attempt!

END OF ACT I.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

The programme of Saturday's concert ran thus:—

Overture, Son and Stranger	...	Mendelssohn.
Song, "As when the dove," Acis and Galatea (with Mosart's additional accompaniments). Miss Jose Sherrington	...	Handel.
Symphony in C minor, "The Tragic" (second time of performance)	...	Schubert.
Air, "Would you gain," Acis and Galatea (with Mendelssohn's additional accompaniments). Mr. Montem Smith ...	...	Handel.
Adagio and Rondo Brillante, Madame Norman-Neruda	...	Vieuxtemps.
Variations, "Ah vous dirai-je," Miss José Sherrington	...	Adam.
Song, "The Violet," Mr. Montem Smith	...	Mozart.
Romance, violin and orchestra, Madame Norman-Neruda	...	Beethoven.
Overture, The Sapphire Necklace	...	A.S.Sullivan.

Mendelssohn's pretty overture was very welcome. Looked at in the abstract there is hardly anything more unaffected and charming in the entire catalogue of orchestral music; while, regarded in connection with the object for which it was written, it touches every heart by its homliness. The overture has a fireside character, and the "affectionate salute" with which it opens is only the prelude to what may, without exaggeration, be called the loving talk of reunited friends. That such a work was heard with pleasure needs no assertion. Schubert's symphony made a greater effect than at its first performance. The lovely andante, the minuet, so full of humour, and the finale, a movement as beautiful and as busy as the finale to Haydn's "Oxford" symphony, were received with the delight which only a work of the highest genius can call forth. The "Tragic" was admirably played, some portion of its enhanced effect being due, perhaps, to a novel rearrangement of the orchestra. Herr Wilhelmj appeared in place of Madame Neruda, and astonished his audience by an easy mastery of the great difficulties in Ernst's fantasia on Otello. He also played an andante by Bach with equal success. Sullivan's capital overture to The Sapphire Necklace made its usual effect. The vocal music calls for no remark. We were sorry to observe that, owing to illness, Mr. Manns was compelled during the latter part of the concert to resign his baton into the hands of Mr. Arthur Sullivan, who proved an efficient deputy.

SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS.

These entertainments appear to be established in that career of prosperity which they deserve. Of the first two concerts we spoke at some length on each occasion. That the third, on Saturday last, was quite equal to them may be inferred from the following programme:—

PART I.

Procession March	...	A. S. Sullivan.
Song, "David singing before Saul"	...	Bordese.
Aria, "Ah, fora 'è lui" (La Traviata)...	...	Verdi.
Song, "The Requital"	...	Blumenthal.
Recitative, "I rage, I melt, I burn" ... ... (Acis and Galatea)	...	Handel.
Aria, "O rud'dier than the cherry"
Fantaisie (Otello)	...	Ernst.
Trio, "Alma infida" (Roberto Devereux) ...	...	Donisetti.

PART II.

Symphony in C (No. 1)	...	Beethoven.
Song, "Anita"	...	Brinley Richards.
Song, "The birds were telling one another" ...	...	Henry Smart.
Song, "Cleansing Fire"	...	Virginia Gabriel.
Song, "The Divers"	...	Edward Loder.
Solo—Violin, Air	...	Bach.
Duet, "The Lord is a man of war"	...	Handel.
Overture (Masaniello)	...	Auber.

Again the fine singing of Mr. Sims Reeves was a prominent feature, and again this great artist was received with enthusiastic welcome. The applause for his performances was as creditable to the public as it was justly due to the artist. Mr. Richards' song (accompanied by the composer) was encored. Madame Sinico also had to repeat Verdi's aria; Mr. Santley, Polyphemus's song, and that composed for him by Miss Gabriel; and Signor Foli, Loder's characteristic ballad. The duet from Israel in Egypt was sung by Mr. Santley and Signor Foli. Herr Wilhelmj fully maintained the impression which he created at the concert of Saturday week. His execution of Ernst's brilliant fantasia was admirable for its facility and certainty. The air of Bach is adapted by Herr Wilhelmj from a suite with accompaniments for stringed instruments. The varied interest of the orchestral music is shown by the list given above, and it only remains to add that the band and the conductor (Mr. Henry Leslie) were as efficient as on the previous occasions, as also was Mr. S. Naylor, the accompanist.

H. L.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

This society gave a performance of Elijah in Exeter Hall on Friday week, to an audience which filled the place almost inconveniently. Like the Messiah and the Creation Mendelssohn's dramatic work rather increases than relaxes its hold upon public affection. The sign is a good one, because the more such music is heard, the greater its influence in refining and elevating public taste. Madame Sinico, Madame Sainton-Dolby, Mr. George Perren, and Mr. Santley were the principal vocalists, assisted by Mrs. Sydney Smith, Miss Julia Elton, Mr. Carter, and Mr. Chaplin Henry. This was Madame Sinico's first appearance in Elijah, and, therefore, her evident over anxiety for textual correctness, to the neglect of expression, must be excused. This remark, however, does not apply to "Hear us, Israel," which Madame Sinico gave with very considerable effect. There is no doubt that the lady will soon become as proficient in oratorio as in opera. Madame Sainton repeated "O rest in the Lord," which, we need hardly say, was rendered after a fashion no other artist can approach. Mr. Perren sang with great care, and obtained much applause. As for Mr. Santley, he was perfection. The choruses were given magnificently; and the performance of "Thanks be to God" was, perhaps, the finest ever heard. Sir Michael Costa conducted.

HECTOR BERLIOZ.—The Memoirs of this composer are to be published in Paris next April—at least so says report, as embodied in a paragraph that has lately been making the round of the Continental press.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

(From the "Saturday Review," Jan. 22.)

Whatever may be doing in the theatres, it can hardly be denied that the tendency of our musical performances, exceptions here and there allowed for, is in a healthy direction. For some years it has been our agreeable task to record the unimpeded progress of the Monday Popular Concerts—not merely because they were consistent from the outset but (and that chiefly) because the principle upon which they started, was sound. Mr. S. Arthur Chappell, who, to employ the conventional phrase, "originally organized" these entertainments, and who has superintended them up to the present time, steadily keeps in view the object for which they were professedly instituted. What this object is we have already stated more than once; but these can be no harm in reminding our readers that the Monday Popular Concerts were set on foot, if not with the sole, at least with the paramount idea of making the vast body of music-lovers resident in or near London acquainted with those masterpieces of art which, though long recognised by the few, had been previously almost a sealed book to the many. That the idea has been satisfactorily realised none who have studied the history of the last decade, in its relations to the art pronounced "untrue," can reasonably gainsay; and that the Monday Popular Concerts have helped to make London musical more effectually than even the Philharmonic Concerts, which for upwards of a half a century appealed exclusively to a privileged class, or than the Sacred Harmonic Society, which in the first place chiefly sought sympathy from the musically-inclined religious world, and in the second has for its basis a repertoire based upon some half-dozen masterpieces since the beginning, is no less unquestionable. At the Monday Popular Concerts we have music for itself, and for itself alone—music precisely as it was intended by the composers who produced it, and with no other temptation than any kind to make it pass muster. Of course efficient execution with such an end in view was a sine qua non, and this, in various degrees of perfection, has been obtained. String quartets, pianoforte sonatas, and other compositions coming under the head of "chamber music," represent art in its highest manifestations. He who can listen to them with attention and pleasure shows himself essentially an amateur, inasmuch as he finds gratification in music simply as music, and not as music set off by this or that extraneous aid. That many such exist is evident, or otherwise, instead of 333 concerts, which, from February, 1859, to the present time, Mr. Chappell has been able to give, he would never, in all probability, have advanced so far as the first half hundred. Meanwhile, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c., are become "household words" in a closer sense than was ever the case before. We previously knew Mozart by his operas, Haydn by his symphonies (in a small degree, be it understood) and vocal canzonets, Mendelssohn by his oratorios and his intimitable Lieder ohne Worte, almost alone. Now we can begin at the beginning and learn in detail the intimate relations—listening to what they said and thought while "musicizing" (as Richard Wagner would say) at their own firesides, for the love of art, and for nothing else. But it is not only with these bright stars that Mr. Chappell is making us thus familiar. He has exhibited some luminaries—"lesser lights" if we will—which have afforded only less gratification. If all musicians were Mozarts and Haydns and Beethovens and Mendelssohns, a painful sense of oppression, we cannot but think, would ensue. A perpetual intercourse with giants might tend to become irksome. True, Haydn, in his way, was an occasionally condescending giant; but tha others, Beethoven in particular, were apt to exhibit themselves in such a manner as to persuade lookers-on that all the rest of the world were dwarfs. For this reason, if for no other, one must feel a strong sympathy for men like Dussek, Woelfl, Sterndale Bennett, &c., who, giants enough compared with ordinary musicians, reveal, nevertheless, certain shortcomings which allow us freely to criticise them, and, while envying their powers, to love them all the more. To the works of men like these, not forgetting Clementi, Hummel, and others, we have been now and then introduced at the Monday Popular Concerts; and rarely has one been heard, when adequately performed, without affording unalloyed satisfaction. The comprehensiveness, in short, with which the scheme of these entertainments is carried out forms by no means one of their least salient attractions.

But to quit generalisation, we may proceed at once briefly to comment upon what, up to this moment, have been the leading incidents of the twelfth season. A detailed account of particulars is uncalled for, inasmuch as it would be tedious alike to our readers and to ourselves were we to enter into new descriptions of works that have long been recognised, and, until the system of Herr Richard Wagner becomes the accepted doctrine, will continue to be recognized, as masterpieces. Let us first state that Mr. Chappell had, as usual, provided well for the legitimate success of his speculation, by engaging the services of a quartet of string-instrument players of proved ability. At the head of these was a lady, whose singular genius absolved her from any necessity of claiming precedence under shelter of the universally-accepted motto—"place aux dames." Woman though she be, Madame Norman-Neruda holds her position by right of thorough ability to sustain it with honour. She has for some time enjoyed a reputation on the Continent as the greatest lady-performer on the violin since Teresa Milanollo, who played "first fiddle" at some of the concerts of the "Beethoven Quartet Society," instituted by the late Mr. T. Alsager (one of the most enthusiastic amateurs of his day), more than a quarter of a century since. But, in our opinion, Madame Neruda surpasses her famous predecessor in more than one respect. During her short visit to England last summer, she showed herself to be possessed of fantasia and concerto—of the free and severe styles of bowing playing. At a concert in St. James's Hall she also declared her capacity in another way, by admirably leading Mendelssohn's quartet in D major, No. 1, Op. 44. At the Monday Popular Concerts, during an interesting series of performances, she has now emphatically proved herself, without distinction of sex, a master of quartet-playing inferior to few that could be named. To say that she possesses a tone equal in strength and richness to that of Herr Joseph Joachim, or that in depth of sentiment and vigour of execution she emulates that greatest of all living masters of the violin, would be to say what is untrue; but where Madame Neruda falls short of Herr Joachim is where, on such an instrument as the fiddle, a woman must inevitably fall short of a man. On the other hand, she has graces of her own which Herr Joachim would no more attempt to rival than Mars to rival the fascinations of Venus. Her handling of the "instrument of instruments" is, in its manner, perfect. Her tone, though wanting in breadth, is perfectly sweet and agreeable; her mechanism, almost invariably true, is in certain respects prodigious; her intonation is rarely, if ever, at fault; and her expression is enchanting, not only because it is always natural and unaffected, not simply because it is utterly devoid of commonplace, but because it bears the stamp of original thought. One of the great attractions of this lady's expression is the entire absence of exaggeration; and this, combined with a manner of phrasing which could scarcely by any possibility be more finished, lends an indescribable charm to her playing. Enough that, in Madame Neruda, Mr. Chappell has celebrated both a new attraction for the public and a mainstay for his quartets, when "the inimitable J. J."—as Herr Joachim is familiarly (and appropriately) styled among amateurs—is not at disposal. The other members of the quartet, during the concerts preceding Christmas, were Herr Ries, who has been "second violin" from this commencement; Signor Zerbini, an occasional and very serviceable, because very competent, viola; and Signor Piatti, whose absence from the quartet of the Monday Popular Concerts would, we think, be more severely felt than that of any other performer. A violinist may lead, and, for a time, Herr Joachim not be missed; but a violoncellist, no matter who, can never play without creating cause for regret that Signor Piatti is absent. Happily, Signor Piatti is now invariably present-sir, his engagement at the Monday Popular Concerts being for the uninterrupted series, season after season.

And now, in a few sentences, we may state what Madame Neruda played, and what she played the best. At the first concert the quartets were Mendelssohn's in D major (already mentioned), and Haydn's in D minor (so often compared with that of Mozart in the same key, which Mozart dedicated to Haydn). With Mendelssohn we were reminded—as was the case last summer; but with Haydn we were beyond measure charmed; purer expression of music that is purity itself could hardly be imagined. At the same concert the lady-violinist gave to perfection the sonata of Mozart in B flat, for violin and pianoforte, written for Mdlle. Strinasacchi—the Norman-Neruda, doubtless, of Mozart's day, although her fame is now exclusively due to the sonata composed expressly for her by the man who also composed Don Giovanni and the Requiem. In this performance Madame Neruda received valuable assistance from Herr Ernst Pauer, a worthy coadjutor, we need hardly say. At the next concert Madame Neruda led a quartet by Haydn, in B flat—a display of execution as superior to that in Beethoven's "Rasoumowsky" quartet, No. 2 (E minor), first upon the programme, as the quartet of Beethoven is superior to that of Haydn. Here we could not but feel that beyond a certain line the genius of the new and interesting violinist, however unique, could not travel. The ripe productions of the greatest of musicians are out of her intellectual reach. At the subsequent concert, however, she not only showed that she could play Mozart's quartet in D minor as well as she had already played its counterpart, by Haydn, in the same key, but she roused the audience to enthusiasm in the adagio from Spohr's ninth violin concerto. To play Haydn and Mozart so as to satisfy their most fervent admirers is no small thing; but to add Spohr—the great realist, who could see the clouds, and imagine nothing above—was to earn a fresh claim for versatility. At the fourth concert Madame Neruda gained a new kind of victory, with Schubert's romantic and somewhat melancholy quartet in A minor (the "Hungarian")—playing on the same occasion, with Mr. Hallé and Signor Piatti, his grand trio in B flat (about which Schumann talked so much rhapsody), and with Mr. Hallé, Beethoven's sonata in A minor (Op. 23). The last-named composer's quartet in G major (Op. 18), and a quartet by Haydn (in C), at the concert after, provided for Madame Neruda not only an occasion again to show how thoroughly she could enter into the spirit of Haydn, but one to show how in Beethoven's earlier works she could feel just as thoroughly at home with Beethoven. At this concert she played, with Mr. Hallé, Mozart's beautiful sonata in F (containing the variations in D minor—administering to all who heard her a salutary lesson in natural and untormented phrasing. Next followed—for the last appearance, Madame Neruda's greatest success, and also her only failure—if failure, where there was so much of excellent, it could justly be called. Anything more touching, refined, and beautiful than her reading of Mozart's "Orpheus" (it has been unjustly styled) quintet in C minor—the quintet of quintets—was never heard; anything more comparatively disappointing than her performance (with Mr. Hallé) of Beethoven's well-known sonata dedicated to Kreutzer, could scarcely be fancied. But this merely proves that if we expect constant perfection we are likely to be deceived. In summing up, briefly, the effect produced upon us by Madame Neruda's successive performances, we may say that she is the greatest and most accomplished lady-violinist in our remembrance; but that she is still a lady violinist. In Haydn and Mozart she is perfect; in the earlier works of Beethoven (whose two Romances, in F and G, by the way, she played at a morning and evening concert respectively, as well as we could dream of hearing them played), she is perfect; in Mendelssohn she is showy and brilliant; but in the larger and profounder works of Beethoven she is somewhat out of her depth. Criticism apart, however, she is a genuine artist, and an invaluable acquisition to the Monday Popular Concerts.

We have already hinted that among the pianists before Christmas were Herr Pauer and Mr. Hallé. Herr Pauer produced, on one evening, a very marked effect by his vigorous and artistic execution of Schubert's very difficult and very elaborate fantasia in C—the one in which the theme of the well-known song, "The Wanderer," is introduced. Mr. Hallé brought forward nothing that he had not previously given at these concerts. This gentleman's execution is as exquisitely neat, as mechanically irreproachable, as ever; but his expression, as was shown more particularly in the sonatas of Schubert in B flat major and A minor, is becoming somewhat over-elaborated. He will not allow a phrase to speak for itself, but puts all, so to say, in "fine language." One might imagine that Mr. Hallé looked upon every simple melody (to quote Les Précieuses ridicules) as "du dernier bourgeois," and strove his utmost to make it assume "le bel air des choses." The other pianist before Christmas was a young lady, a foreigner, who attempted Beethoven's so-called Sonata Pastorale (in D, Op. 28), and played it in a manner so closely resembling that an inexperienced educated young girl, that we withhold her name, and merely enter a protest against such exhibitions at high-class entertainments, as altogether out of place.

The two concerts since Christmas have been interesting for more reasons than one. That conscientiously striving violinist, Herr Ludwig Straus, on each evening, led the quartets, with his accustomed zeal and ability. These were the glorious No. I (so-called, although, in strict accuracy, No. 3) of Beethoven, in F, and his still more glorious No. 14 (No. 3 of the "Razoumowsky" set), in C. Then we had for the twentieth time at least, the same composer's famous septet in E flat, for string and wind instruments, about which Haydn thought so much, and Beethoven, affectedly, so little, while posterity, without reference either to Haydn or Beethoven, has proclaimed it "immortal"; and Mozart's scarcely less familiar, and certainly not less beautiful, quintet in A, for clarionet and string quartet, in which Mr. Lazarus plays the clarionet part as well as he has ever played it—and he has played it often enough. On each occasion the pianist, Madame Arabella Goddard in accordance with what, in her case, is a time-honoured custom brought forward something never previously heard at the Monday Popular Concerts. On the first evening it was a grand fantasia by the late Friedemann Bach, eldest of Johann Sebastian Bach's twenty-one children, and most gifted of his twelve sons, the majority of whom were more or less musical. The second son, Philipp Emmanuel, is in the world's belief, after his father, the most celebrated who bore it. It honoured name; but this Philipp Emmanuel himself said of his elder brother, W. Friedemann, that he (W. Friedemann) represented their father better than all the rest of them put together ("Er konnte unserm Vater eher ersetzen als wir alle zusammengenommen"). The truth is, however, that Friedemann Bach was more richly endowed than industrious—that is, be it understood, compared with the people about him—for an idle "Bach" would have been something very far beyond a perseveringly diligent composer bearing any other name. Enough that Friedemann Bach has left a great deal of music, much of which is in print, still more, possibly, in manuscript. What is known of him shows that he stands nearer to his illustrious father even than Philipp Emmanuel, of whom Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven (totally ignorant of Friedemann) knew so much, and whom they esteemed so highly. Friedemann was the greatest organist of his day, and the greatest organ composer. What Madame Goddard selected as an example of his genius, was one of those works for the clavichord (now pianoforte) which have hitherto only existed in manuscript.* She had already played it at her pianoforte recitals, last year, to a more select (which may signify less numerous) audience; but the reception given to it by Mr. Chappell's "2,000" or thereabouts, was heartier than could by any likelihood have been obtained from a "fashionable" audience in the summer. The work itself, which we have no space to describe, is eminently remarkable; it not only foreshadows Haydn and Mozart, but occasionally even Beethoven. Unlike the organ music of Friedemann Bach, which bears so close a resemblance to that of his father, it is something quite new and distinct from the clavichord music of that great model—as new, indeed, for its time, as anything that ever came from spontaneously plastic genius. At the second concert, Madame Goddard played the magnificent "Introduction, Fugue, and Sonata," in C minor, of Woelfl—another among the many neglected musical geniuses who have lived, and laboured, and produced comparatively in vain. To Woelfl, however, about whom we hope to find some other opportunity of speaking, we have already cursorily referred; and all we can at present say of his sonata in C minor is that it was just as welcome and just as cordially received as the fantasia of W. Friedemann Bach. Madame Goddard's other performances were Mendelssohn's sonata in D (No. 2), for pianoforte and violoncello, and W. Sterndale Bennett's sonata-duo in A for the same instruments—in both of which her associate was Signor Piatti. Players better matched could not be named—in saying which we are paying the highest possible compliment to each. The sonata of our greatest English musician was especially interesting, as having been given for the first time at the Monday Popular Concerts—although it is now some eighteen years since it was written (expressly for Signor Piatti). A more finished, interesting, and engaging piece of its kind could hardly be named. The middle movement alone would stamp it as a work of genius.

The vocal music at these concerts, though not invariably of the same high order, or exhibiting the same commendable spirit of research, as the instrumental, was especially noticeable at the two performances under immediate consideration. The singer was Mr. Santley, who at the first concert introduced, for the first time, an Italian song by Alessandro Scarlatti (father of Domenico Scarlatti, the celebrated composer for the harpsichord)—"O cessate di piegarmi," which Handel might have owned, and from which Handel unquestionably drew inspiration; besides two of the most familiar songs of Schubert—the "Praise of Tears" and "Hark! the Lark." When Mr. Santley sings, and when Mr. Santley sings such music, it must add to the attraction of any concert, however classical.

At the afternoon performance on Saturday we shall once more hear Herr Joseph Joachim—with whose appearance, as of yore, the Monday Popular Concert season attains its zenith.

(From the "Graphic," Jan. 22.)

The Monday Popular Concerts began after a short recess, on the 10th inst., and began in good earnest, by introducing three celebrities for the first time this season. Madame Arabella Goddard, Herr Straus, and Mr. Santley, the artists in question, have long been associated with Mr. Chappell's enterprise; and each received the welcome due to an established favourite. In addition to this personal interest, there was the interest of an important musical novelty. Madame Goddard played the fantasia by W. Friedemann Bach (eldest and most gifted of the great John Sebastian's many children), which, at her last recitals, drew attention to the claims of a neglected genius. Friedemann seems to have been a strange character, one of those who stand very much in their own light. But his greatest misfortune, we fancy, was the name he bore. The public knew only one Bach, and having the music of an illustrious father, cared little for what was generally looked upon as a group of clever sons. Hence, though Friedemann wrote much, comparatively few of his works were printed; among those remaining in manuscript being the fantasia now under notice. The latter will do somewhat among English amateurs on behalf of the eccentric Halle organist. It will show, for example, that he had a vigorous fancy, graceful ideas, and a power of masterly treatment, such as belongs only to cultivated genius. Moreover, there is in the work a curious anticipation of modern style. Music belonging to Bach's period and has suggestive of it would not easily be found. For the benefit of our readers who are amateurs, we may state that the fantasia is now first published by Duncan Davison & Co., as one of a series of "Revivals," edited by Mr. J. W. Davison. How Madame Goddard played it there is hardly need to tell. Such difficulties as the music presents were nothing to her facile and unerring fingers; while, as regards the composer's ideas, Madame Goddard invariably comes forward prepared to interpret whatever she undertakes with strict conscientiousness and high intelligence. The other works in the programme—upon none of which have we time to dwell—were Beethoven's first (third) quartet; the same master's septet (twentieth time), and Mendelssohn's sonata in D major, for piano and violoncello.

At last Monday's concert the artists already named again appeared; and again there was a novelty for the pianoforte. This time Madame Goddard who is always "prospecting," and turning up nuggets over which others have walked heedlessly, brought forward a sonata in C minor (Op. 35), by Joseph Woolf, a man who came very near to being a great master, and who for that reason, perhaps, has failed to notice than others less gifted. Mercury is obscured by its proximity to the sun; and Woolf, along with Dussek and a goodly company, may have suffered because his genius challenged the inevitable defeat of comparison with the genius of greater men. Taking the sonata in C minor as a fair specimen of Woolf's music, he must be reckoned a composer of no ordinary gifts. It would seem as though the man resolved to show by means of one work the extent both of his science and his fancy. The result proves the undowments. How masterly, for example, is the fugue with which, after a brief introduction, the work opens! Framed upon the strictest model of its order, this movement has all the energy, clearness, and fluency of Bach or Handel. As regards the quick movements of the sonata proper, their interest never flags; or, if it does so in the slightest degree, some bold or ingenious passage raises it again higher than ever. The adagio has a form of its own; but none the less can it boast a distinctive beauty. Indeed, we regard the manner in which Woolf here treats a single theme as among the best proofs of his skill. With such a work in hand, Madame Goddard was fairly on her mettle, but she conquered Woolf as she has conquered every other maker of key-board difficulties. Her playing, like the composer's genius, was equal to the fugue no less than to the fantasia, and to the fantasia not less than to the fugue. So wonderful a display of skill is by no means a common event; and we fear that even the Monday Popular audience failed to discern half the marvel of it. In addition, Madame Goddard played, with Signor Pitti, Professor Bennett's Sonata in A major for pianoforte and violoncello. We observe that this graceful and charming work was given in St. James's Hall for the first time; and we wonder—not unwarmly, looking at its grace and charm—why it was never heard before. It would seem English concerts really have no excuse to complain; for here, at all events, is the foremost of them, as represented by a great classical work, waiting twelve years for recognition. Shall we, in view of the enthusiasm Dr. Bennett's sonata excited, hear it again and again? Put the question to any one of last Monday's audience, and the answer would be—"If not, why not?" We would gladly go through the five movements in detail; but it must be enough to say that our countryman's work is, if beauty be the elixir vitæ of music, destined to immortality. The other works given at the concert were the third (in C major) of Beethoven's Rasoumowsky quartets and Mozart's popular clarionet quintet. Mr. Santley had to repeat Pistti's song, "Swallow, swallow, flying south," and also Seymour Egerton's "Go not, happy day."

HAYDN'S SEASONS.

The last great work of Haydn—not reckoning as great his final contributions to the eighty-three quartets—was given at the Oratorio Concert on Thursday evening week, in St. James's Hall. Mr. Barnby has added another item to his list of good things done by thus reminding the public that Haydn wrote more than one oratorio. There was danger of the fact being overlooked here in London, where the Creation is attractive enough to form the sole representative of its composer's skill in the highest branch of his art. The neglect into which the Seasons has fallen is not difficult to explain. Haydn's own remark, "My Creation will endure, and, probably, the Seasons also," may have been prompted by other than a sense of the latter's inferiority as music. Nothing can be more obvious than the immense difference in the interest of the two subjects. Compared with the story of the world, the story of the year, an every-day incident to some phenomenal occurrence. Moreover—and this, in England, means a great deal—the one oratorio is scriptural, the other not; to use Haydn's own words, "There, angels sing; here rustics." But, though the cause of neglect is thus, in great part, obvious, the justice of neglect does not at all appear. As music, we hold the Seasons to be little inferior to the Creation; while as music adequate to its theme, it takes, in our opinion, much higher rank. In the Creation, Haydn attempted that which would have tasked the power and genius of Handel or Beethoven. The genial old chapel-master sitting down before the "finest and whitest possible" paper, with his hair elaborately dressed, his clothes showing "a degree of magnificence," and the indispensable royal ring on his finger, scarcely appears the man fit for so mighty a work. But none could sketch the face of nature more gracefully; and in the Seasons Haydn has given us landscapes equally marked by idealism and minute fidelity to his subject. His pictures are full of refinement, even the storm in "Summer" raging after a decorous fashion; while the men and women introduced are sentimental squires and dames playing at rusticity. Haydn's genius was precisely adapted to the production of such a work.

The Baron von Swieten, librarian to the Emperor of Austria, is well known to have suggested the Creation as a subject for musical treatment. To this gentleman we are also indebted for the Seasons. It is probable that Haydn needed no urging to undertake either task. In 1790, seven years before the Creation, and eleven before the Seasons has been given, some time in England, where his visits had undoubtedly had great influence over him. At all events, some such strong inducement must have been required for the writing of an oratorio at sixty-nine years of age. Haydn set to work after a fashion of his own; and, far more than in the Creation, anticipated that free use of the orchestra which is one of the canons of modern music. There is this difference, however, between Haydn and his latest successors—the former is always tuneful and intelligible, the latter are rarely either. The lavish employment of instrumental resources in the Seasons has been frequently attacked. Zelter, Haydn's friend and correspondent, styled the work "a symphony with singing;" another critic called it "in great part recitative with unusually rich accompaniments;" and a third says that but for the choruses, the Seasons would consist merely of "fatiguing, partially interesting pieces." Of these commentators, the first and second exaggerate; the third misrepresents, after the fashion of the "thoughtful" school which cannot be satisfied with Haydn's simple masterpieces unless in our view, Haydn's use of his orchestra in the Seasons is not only charming, but most happily suited to the character of the work. The master had to express the thousandfold individualities of nature, and "hence" wrote Mendelssohn's father to his gifted son, "I could at last little endure to lose the crowing of the cock, the whinying of the lark, the lowing of the cattle, and the rustic glee of the peasants as I could in nature herself." The choruses of the Seasons are fine beyond dispute. If not one among these be equal in breadth and grandeur to "The Heavens are telling," there is not one unworthy of Haydn. The old musician seems to have determined that his last effort at choral writing should be among his best, and we have the result in "Hark! the mountains resound," "Joyful the liquor flows," and the finale in praise of everlasting spring.

Enough has been said to show that the revival of Thursday night was both interesting and important; especially as Mr. Barnby gave the work almost in its entirety, omitting only the final chorus of "Autumn." The performance was, on the whole, very fair, and might have been better had not Mr. Barnby adopted the prevalent fashion of taking the music at a quicker speed than its composer intended. With Handel this practice does little harm, but Haydn's delicate orchestration invariably suffers. The principal singers were Madame Sherrington, Mr. Byron, and Mr. Lewis Thomas, Madame Sherrington was well suited in her music, and made a great success with the two beautiful airs, "O how pleasing to the senses," and "Light and life." Mr. Byron appeared in place of Mr. Vernon Rigby at short notice, and his singing of "The traveller stands" obtained one of the warmest applause of the evening. In Mr. Lewis Thomas we need hardly say, the trying bass solos had a conscientious and efficient interpreter. Mr. Thomas's rendering of the very different airs, "Behold, along the dewy valley," and "In this, O vain misguided man," was exceedingly satisfactory. We could hardly expect the chorus to be quite at ease with such unfamiliar, and, in many parts, difficult music; nevertheless, a very fair success was obtained. Among the numbers best sung were "Come, gentle spring," and "Hark, the deep tremendous voice;" perhaps the most admirable examples of Haydn's choral writing in their different styles. Zelter's description of the Seasons, quoted above, is but an exaggeration; the orchestral accompaniments, remarkably beautiful as most of the cases usually bestowed on a great symphonist's work. We cannot say they were faultless on Thursday night, though, undoubtedly, as much efficiency was shown as could be expected under our system of concert-giving, which permits but one band rehearsal. The audience, a large one, evidently enjoyed Haydn's work greatly; and, so far, there is no reason why it should again fall into disuse.

MEYERBEER.—The parts of Herr R. Wagner's new effusion, Die Walküre, are already given out. The rehearsals, however, will not commence before the return of Mdlle. Stehle, who will be the Brunhilde, but who is now on a starring tour.

A NAMING ESCAPE.—The new and magnificent building recently erected by the Musical Association, and opened with such ceremony by the Emperor himself, was very near destruction a few days since. A fire broke out in one of the cloak rooms, and for two hours defied all efforts to extinguish it. The great hall was so much damaged that it cannot be used at present. The smaller hall fortunately escaped without any injury.

"CHILPERIC."

WE have all heard of the man whose last state, owing to an increase in the number and wickedness of the evil spirits within him, was worse than his first. At the beginning that miserable person was tenanted by only one devil; but the one, being gregarious and liking the quarters, took seven others of a worse class, and made an infernal party. The narrative illustrates much. It has even a musical application, and to this we turn at once, foregoing all the obvious moralizings upon the easy descent of Avernus, &c., which the general subject invites.

There was a time when the man aforesaid had no devil; and there was, also, a time when society knew not Offenbach. Society may have been, even then, far from musically pure, but—it knew not Offenbach. That is to say, it was free from the influence of one who, by uniting a certain form of art with positive absurdity and comparative indecency, not only degrades art in all its forms, but makes it attractive in its degradation. So far the past had the advantage of the present. M. Offenbach is with us; his music is heard in all our public places (streets included), and Schneider is his prophetess. If the mischief were sure to end, as it began, with M. Offenbach, there would be less cause for crying out, "Life is short and art is long;" and the art of music may survive the life of M. Offenbach. But mischief has always extraordinary vitality. Where one devil gains an entrance, seven others are pretty sure to follow. It was a foregone conclusion, therefore, that Offenbach, in possession and flourishing, would attract others more or less like unto himself. The result has borne out the conclusion. We have, at all events, M. Hervé.

The question arises here, in what respect M. Hervé resembles his prototype. We answer,—In so far as he is unlike Offenbach, he is worse than Offenbach. The latter must be considered a genius in his way. At any rate he possesses the uncommon faculty of knowing what he can do, and sticking to it. There are rumours that, just as Mr. Buckstone is said to consider himself a great tragic actor spoilt by an erratic Fate, so M. Offenbach longs to appear in the character of a serious composer. We shall believe these rumours when they are verified, and not before. There is nothing in the man's works to show that he is in danger of mistaking his rôle, and of producing music worthy a musician's serious consideration. M. Offenbach will, doubtless, remain content to pipe that Folly may dance; and to derive his chief inspiration from Eros. So far, we have a certain respect for him. Moreover—and this increases our respect—he mixes only a low form of art with the other ingredients of an Offenbachian cup He wears his colours (motley) on his sleeve, without seeking to hide them underneath the classic toga. Now let us turn to M. Hervé. This gentleman also comes to us hand-in-hand with Folly; but, judging from some portions of Chilperic, he is not content simply to make folks laugh with (and at) him. He would ape the grand seigneur of music. He would take flight now and then, heedless of Icarus, into the pure atmosphere of high art. Hence there are passages in his music, the intention of which is obvious, and which jar strangely with the buffoonery of their surroundings. Against this development of Offenbachism it is needful to protest, because the precedent may be followed; and there may arise a man both willing and able—which M. Hervé is not—to command the union of high art and folly. Heaven forefend this issue. We have no objection to Pan's pipes when the show is Punch and Judy; but it would be an incongruous thing for the hero of our peripatetic drama, to thrash his wife to the strains of Beethoven. Here, then, is something to be done: When M. Hervé, or anybody else, lifts his hand to drag real art down to the level of opéra-bouffe, rap his knuckles.

Against opéra-bouffe, pure and simple, we shall not preach, any more than we shall criticize its music. When M. Hervé, in Chilperic, is not ambitious, his lively strains help to laughter; and after all nonsense has its use. Nonsense has, also, its sphere—to which it should be kept.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

Last Monday's concert, if it gave rise to unavoidable disappointment, showed the strength of Mr. Arthur Chappell's company, and the sound principles on which he conducts his enterprise. The "star" was absent, but the programme was, nevertheless, unchanged. A telegram received from Manchester, certifying that Madame Norman-Neruda was prevented by indisposition from travelling, was circulated in the hall, but, while announcing the bane, proclaimed an antidote. It stated that Herr Straus would undertake Madame Neruda's duties, and he himself be replaced by M. Zerlini. Herr Straus is one of the most capable and widely-read players of the day. Nothing good comes amiss to him, and to everything he does justice. The programme offered no novelty, and on that account, perhaps, most certain to be enjoyed. This is peculiarly applicable to Schubert's quartet in A minor, but recently made patent to the general public, since, often repeated, now thoroughly admired and loved. Nor does Beethoven's "serenade trio" need to be dilated upon. Least of all would the Sonate Pathétique have borne a single word had it not been entrusted to Mr. Frederic H. Cowen, yet unused to public playing, though a composer of acknowledged talent and still greater promise. The extraordinary effect made by the symphony brought out at his own concert a few weeks ago must be fresh in the memory of our readers. The heartiness with which Mr. Cowen was received, was a testimony to the reputation of the young composer, while the applause at the conclusion of the sonata may also be taken as a recognition of his ability in the highest branch of his profession. He was joined by Herr Straus in Mozart's B flat sonata (not the one composed for Strinasacchi) for piano and violin; and Miss Edith Wynne—more at home in Schubert's fine song, "The mighty trees bend," than in Elvira's trying aria, "Ah! tradi," from Don Giovanni—was the vocalist of the evening. Mr. Benedict was the accompanist. C.

We are glad to learn that Mr. W. H. Cummings has recovered from his recent severe indisposition. He has been singing in various parts of the country during this week, with the usual success; his recovery seems, therefore, perfect.

NATIONAL CHORAL SOCIETY.—All the music at the concert on Wednesday was by Mendelssohn. There was the Hymn of Praise and Walpurgis Night, and between these great works, sacred and secular, one of the three Motets composed for the Nuns of the Trinita di Monti at Rome. To this very interesting performance (conducted, as usual, by Mr. G. W. Martin), we shall return next week.

WEIMAR.—Mad. Pauline Lucca will appear one night next month at the Grand Ducal Theatre, and afterwards sing at a Court Concert. On the first of next month, too, Mad. Viardot Garcia, accompanied by her pupils, will arrive in this pleasant little capital, where she proposes making a stay of three months.

PROVINCIAL.

WINDSOR.—The following is from a correspondent:—

"Dr. Crotch's oratorio, Palestine (words by Bishop Heber), has been given in the Town Hall, by the Choral Society. The vocalists were Mrs. H. Barnby, Messrs. Large, Hunt, and Briggs. Mr. G. A. Griesbach was principal violin and Dr. Elvey conducted.—Mr. Montem Smith has given a lecture on "Ballads" at the Institution.—A "Literary and Musical Evening" took place on the previous Tuesday."

LLANARTH.—The Carmarthen Journal of the 21st says:—

"The Church Choir celebrated their annual concert, on Thursday last. Miss Walters commenced with a performance on the harmonium, which was followed by a song from the choir, under the leadership of Mr. J. S. Evans."

NANTERTH.—We read in the Carmarthen Journal as follows:—

"A concert was given at Tavernspite National School-room, on Tuesday evening, by the Lampeter Velfrey Church Choir, in aid of the Haverfordwest west Infirmary. The vocalists were Miss Kate Lewis, Miss Minnie Reynolds, Mr. James Frizell, Mr Walter Reynolds, Mr. Williams (Hill), Mr. Bowen, and Mr. Venables. Mrs. Frizell and Miss Reynolds presided at the piano. There was a very large attendance, and the programme was got through in such a manner as to elicit the loudest applause."

BIRMINGHAM.—The committee of the Amateur Harmonic Association have just issued their fifteenth annual report. From it we gather the following particulars:—

"Society makes steady progress;—has performed during 1869 these works:—Schubert's Song of Miriam, Mendelssohn's 'Hear my Prayer' and 'Lord, bow down,' Benedict's Richard Cœur-de-Lion, Spohr's 'God, Thou art great,' Mozart's Mass No. 1 and 'Ave verum,' Haydn's Mass No. 1, Gade's Erl-King's Daughter, and Smart's Bride of Dunkerron, besides several minor works;—Mr. Loran chosen librarian and Mr. Kimberley resigned;—number of members, 182;—forty-three rehearsals during the year, average attendance 74;—larger attendance necessary;—orchestra to be erected in Masonic Hall; finances flourishing, balance in hand being £64 8s. 7d.;—members invited to take part in forthcoming festival."

MANCHESTER.—The Prodigal Son was heard in the Free Trade Hall, on Thursday week, and a local critic thus assesses its merits:—

"After hearing the Prodigal Son, we have no hesitation in asserting that it is de-tined to secure a place in the catalogue of good and noble music. That its composer has made a vast step in advance of anything he had previously accomplished no one will deny; any more than they will doubt his ability to rise to yet greater heights. We believe nothing superior has been produced in England since the death of Mendelssohn. The learning and carefulness of the patient student are quite subordinate to the truly devotional spirit which prevails throughout. There is not the slightest approach to pandering to popular ignorance—no departure from the canons of propriety and good taste, and no absurd introduction of meaningless glitter or vapid prettiness. The orchestral accompaniments are in themselves a series of picturesque illustrations. There is scarcely a number which has not some striking effect, and yet, with all the novelty—with all the evidence there is of originality and varied inventive power, no extravagance or waste of force is noticeable in the whole composition. We have already indicated the excellent character of the performance. We believe, indeed, that Mr. Sullivan himself expressed great surprise at the advanced state of the rehearsals and intelligent appreciation of the members of the choir when he first heard them, and also that last night the efforts of the ladies and gentlemen, in the orchestra, were certainly not less gratifying to him, than the enthusiastic cheers of the audience."

BIRMINGHAM.—Our own correspondent has transmitted us the following:—

"Mr. Harrison's concert on the 19th was highly successful, if we may judge by the audience that filled the Town Hall and the satisfaction with which every thing was received. The artists were Mdlles. Tietjens, Vanzini, and Scalchi, Signori Tagliafico, La Rocca, Tito Mattei, and Herr Stockhausen, with Signor Bevignani as accompanist. The great German prima donna, who has returned from Hamburgh in magnificent voice, besides being encored in each of her pieces, was twice called after 'The Minstrel Boy,' evoking a perfect furore. Herr Stockhausen (son of the famous Madame Stockhausen, who enjoyed such renown many years since) created a decidedly favorable impression by his artistic singing; but 'Adelaide' (which had been set down for Mr. Sims Reeves, who was absent through indisposition) was not best calculated for his voice, although transposed to meet the requirements of the occasion. The programme was in the main composed of things more or less hackneyed, and beyond this needs no remark except that its original dimensions were somewhat abridged in consequence of the numerous encores. Madame Norman-Neruda, who made so great an impression recently on her first appearance here, is again announced, with Mr. Hallé and Mr. Sims Reeves for February 4th; a fortnight later, Madame Schumann, Herr Joachim, Signor Piatti, Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, and Mr. Vernon Rigby are engaged. Mr. Arthur Sullivan's Prodigal Son is in rehearsal by the Choral Society; but particulars have not yet been announced. Of all these matters, more anon.—BUTTON OF BRAUNSCHAU.

EDINBURGH.—In the Daily Review of the 21st appears the following:—

"Yesterday afternoon, Professor Oakeley gave one of his interesting organ performances in his Class-room, Park Place. There was a large and attentive audience. The following selection was played:—

"Andante from the Suites Franaises and Fugue in E major, Bach; Andante from 1st Symphony in C, Mozart; Five Variations on an original Theme, for Organ, Hesse; Adagio cantabile, and Menuetto a Trio (Septuor) Beethoven; Andante, from an Offertoire for Organ (In Memoriam), Lefebure-Wely; Chanson Orientale, Schumann; Overture, Athaliah, Handel.

"At the close of the performance, which was heartily applauded, the Professor stated his intention to give, on that day week, a sketch of the music to be performed at the approaching Reid Commemoration Concert."

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

THE "SEASONS."

The Daily News speaks thus of Haydn's last great work, in its notice of Mr. Barnby's concert:—

"Haydn's Creation, beautiful and masterly as it is, has somewhat unjustly superseded, in public performance and in general estimation, his subsequent work, the Seasons. As between Mendelssohn's Elijah and St. Paul (with the difference that these works stood in inverse order of production), the one has overshadowed the other to an extent scarcely justified by preponderance of merit. Few things in musical art are more remarkable than the beauty and freshness of the two great closing works of Haydn's long and active career—the Creation, completed when he was 66, and the Seasons at the age of nearly 70. Full of genius, power, and beauty as is the earlier oratorio, it scarcely anywhere realizes the grandeur and sublimity of its subject—one, indeed, which would have required a Handel or a Beethoven to illustrate. In the Seasons, however, the religious element is but occasional and partial, and the characters are human, instead of, as in the Creation, angelic. The slight dramatic action which is included in the version of the text of Die Jahreszeiten, based on Thomson's poem, by the librettist Swieten (who also prepared the words of the Creation, and is otherwise associated with the biographies of both Haydn and Mozart), deals with the feelings and sentiments of rustics; whereas, in the Creation, as already said, angels are supposed to be personified. Moreover, that tendency to the literal and the descriptive which is beneath the dignity of the one work is felt to be far more justifiable and appropriate in the other. On any high principles of art-criticism, therefore, the Seasons must almost inevitably be preferred to its precursor, although, perhaps, equal genius and power are manifested in both. That same genial freshness of thought and brightness of fancy should be retained to the age of nearly 70, is, as already said, among the wonders of art-history; another instance being that of Auber, whose Rêve d'Amour was brought out at Paris, last December, its composer being now just approaching his 68th year."

The opinion of the Sunday Times is thus expressed:—

"The music we shall hardly be expected to go through in detail; there are, however, some of its general features which repay attention. One such is the important work the orchestra has to perform throughout. The nature of the subject, perhaps, led to this; owing to the absolute demand for picturesque writing. But it is worthy of notice how thoroughly Haydn comprehended the necessity, and how successfully he met it. Such a thing was new in his day. The orchestra of the period was strictly subordinate to the voices; and any notion of reversing this state of things would have seemed rank heresy. But Haydn had all his life been free from the trammels of precedent; and with him to see a thing desirable was to attempt it. Hence the prominence of orchestral writing in the Seasons. We need not discuss the success of it. Haydn was not the Turner of tone-painting (there are many would-be Turners now a days, but all they achieve is a splash of colour, in which neither form nor design can be made out); he was able, however, to convey his meaning in a few simple and graceful touches. This he does all through the Seasons. His most descriptive passages never call forth a sense of incongruity; and many of them are so happy that we stand amazed at the results obtained by such apparently obvious means. Another of the noteworthy features in the Seasons is the grandeur and beauty of the choral music. How much of the latter quality, for example, do we find in 'Come, gentle spring,' one of the most elegant specimens of part-writing ever given to the world. In 'God of Light' we have dignity and power of a high order, which, however, are excelled in 'Hark! the drep tremendous voice.' The latter is a masterpiece of descriptive writing, because sufficiently descriptive without falling into the error of being too literal. In the chorus of the hunters, and that of the vintners, Haydn seems absolutely to revel with the subject. The result brings the scenes illustrated before the eyes with a vividness which in itself the highest praise the master could receive. Worthy of all that has gone before is the glorious finale, 'Then comes the dawn.' It marks, to use words applied to another great production, a worthy effort, worthily achieved. We must leave the solo pieces to speak for themselves; that we may express a hope of hearing Haydn's latest oratorio as frequently as it deserves. There is no cause at all adequate for the neglect it has received; and to this fact Mr. Barnby's performance has called a degree of attention which may end in something like an act of justice."

"CHILPERIC."

Here is the opinion of the Daily News as to M. Hervé's latest opéra-bouffe:—

"Chilperic is distinguished from the Offenbach productions by a more ambitious style throughout. Indeed, Chilperic in many parts is real opera rather than opera-bouffe, and there is as much sentimental music in it as in Meyerbeer's Huguenots. We may mention the chorus of Druids, the solo of the high priest Divitiacus, and many of the pieces sung by M. Hervé and Miss Muir. The result may be a certain amount of heaviness, at variance with the character of the production; but it certainly raises the standard of the work, and even enhances, in a great degree, the effect of those lighter portions with which burlesque should be naturally associated."

On the same subject the Daily Telegraph says:—

"The story will not interest, but the music may. It is much more pretensions than that which M. Offenbach is in the habit of writing, and, to our thinking, has much less of the vis comica. M. Hervé's undoubted and unquestionable facility lead him into imitating the tricks of grand opera, and from this serious, although exaggerated, style, he plunges, as by an effort, into the quick, bright, piquant dance melodies for which his rival is celebrated. It is right to add that M. Hervé writes cleverly for the voice, and scores with the hand of a master."

All of which to us—proceeding, be it understood, from such competent authorities on musical matters—is utterly inexplicable.

The Observer of Sunday last, in a notice of the Monday Popular Concert of the 17th inst., has the following:—

"On Monday last the concert-room was crowded to welcome the reappearance of Madame Arabella Goddard, who is now, as she always has been, by far the greatest attraction of the season. Her first performance was a sonata in C minor for the pianoforte alone, composed by Woelfl; her second was W. S. Bennett's sonata in A major for pianoforte and violoncello, the latter instrument being played by Signor Piatti. The sonata by Woelfl was introduced for the first time at these concerts. It is a work of great merit, and deserves to be better known. It is long since any of Woelfl's music has been revived for public performance. The intrinsic value of this piece was greatly increased by the superb play of Madame Goddard. The duo by Professor Bennett is one of his most delightful compositions, full of grace, sentiment, and refinement, and Madame Goddard and Signor Piatti delivered the spirit of it."

The Standard speaks thus of W. Friedemann Bach's fantasia and its performance at the concert of the 10th inst.:—

"Although the programme of the first concert after Christmas was strictly according to pattern, it yet contained the elements of novelty—for as such must be considered the fantasia for pianoforte, composed by Friedemann Bach, one of the many sons of John Sebastian, all renowned as celebrated musicians, although none of them possessed the talent of their great ancestor. The fantasia in A consists of four movements—the first, partaking of the nature of a prelude, contains several bravura passages and arpeggios; the second is a graceful allegretto in E minor, the third a quaint moderato, and the fourth a rondo in A major, affording the executant an opportunity for great digital display. In fact, the whole work shows that the composer must have been a most expert performer, and it excites our astonishment that in days previous to the influence of the great Haydn, such dexterity had been acquired as to enable a composer to pen such passages as abound in this fantasia. Scarlatti, it is well known, was accused of talking to his cat more than 'mortal powers,' when he wrote and executed his violoncello duos with his friend Francephilli, but we never heard anything against the Bach family, who were proverbially pious. Of Madame Goddard's rendering of the work on Monday evening, it is scarcely possible to speak in too flattering terms. Her touch, command over the tone of the instrument displayed in alternate power and delicacy, her splendid phrasing and accuracy of execution were all most delightfully exhibited, and the applause which greeted her on the conclusion of the fantasia testified to the success with which she introduced it to the Monday Popular audience. The fantasia has, we believe, been once before played from an old MS. copy, but on Monday evening the edition lately brought out by Messrs. Duncan Davison & Co., of 244, Regent Street, was for the first time placed on the desk of the pianoforte. It assists greatly the study and performance of the work, both from its clear type, and the accurate marks of expression which are introduced."

About the sonata for pianoforte and violoncello, played by Madame Goddard and Signor Piatti, at the concert following, the Standard writes as follows:—

"The Sonata-duo by Professor Bennett, which adorned the second part of the programme, is one of his most delightful compositions—full of grace, sentiment, and refinement, and withal so cleverly constructed that it stamps its author as one of the greatest living composers."

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

WOOLWICH.—An extremely good performance of the Messiah took place on Tuesday evening, in the recreation room of the Garrison, under the direction of Mr. Smyth, bandmaster of the Royal Artillery. The chorus and band numbered over 200 performers. The prices of admission, ranging from three pence to half-a-crown, brought the concert within reach of all, from commandant to the drummer. The solos were sung by the Misses Stelle, Mrs. Sallenger, Sergeant A. Mansfield, J. Smith, C. Buckland, Grenner, E. Mansfield, and Mr. Hartley Vinning, in a manner, for the greater part, worthy all praise; and air after air was loudly applauded by the crowded assemblage. Trumpeter J. Bent's obbligato, in "The trumpet shall sound," created a favourable impression. The whole performance gave satisfaction, and the Hospital has received a welcome addition to its funds. To the exertions of Mr. J. Smith and the artists engaged, all of whom have received the thanks, and deservedly so, of the committee, this was mainly due.

THE BISHOP OF WINCHESTER AND THE CAMBERWELL PARISHIONERS.

(From the "Choir," Jan. 22.)

Setting aside the fact that Camberwell plays an important part in a popular drama at one of our metropolitan theatres, and that it is a region dear to the hearts of omnibus passengers, we question whether the majority of our readers have ever bestowed much thought upon the highly classic locality. Henceforth, however, it will be celebrated in ecclesiastical history, as having furnished the first problem which Dr. Wilberforce has been called upon to solve since his translation to the See of Winchester. In the diocese of Oxford the Bishop was well known as a ready and successful arbiter in all disputes between priests and people, or to speak more correctly we should say between people and priests, for the quarrels are generally begun by the former, and it was therefore only natural that the parishioners of this southern suburb should refer to his lordship a grievance which they found almost too heavy to be borne. Clearly does their conduct illustrate the truth of the saying that "fools rush in where angels fear to tread," and we cannot help thinking that the sound common sense which fell from the Bishop's lips combining so thoroughly the suaviter in modo with the fortiter in re, must have caused the irascible local Bumbles to wish that they had settled their squabbles at home instead of venturing within the portals of Winchester House, but to Cæsar they elected to go, and to Cæsar they went, and we can only express our earnest hope that they were satisfied with the result.

In order to give a fair idea of the facts of the case which, from the strong expression of opinion it evoked from the Bishop, has more than a local interest, it will be well first to call attention to the state of the church in the neighbourhood. Here, as in the majority of the South London parishes, vestrydom has until recently been the chief power. The mere mention of chanting the psalms has been sufficient to rouse a storm of opposition which only orators, who are in the habit of talking themselves hoarse until the small hours of the morning, have diluted with enthusiasm, while the introduction of a surpliced choir in the place of the mixed body of ladies and gentlemen who occupy the organ loft, has been regarded with that intense horror which can only be accepted as the proof of an extremely ill regulated mind, and of a chronic state of colour-blindness. Anything in the way of ritual has, in the sunny south, been a thing unheard of except in a few notable instances. The vestments have, it is true, been numerous, the chief variations permitted having been in the shape of the ministerial black gowns presented at correct intervals to favourite pastors, by the ladies of their flocks. In the arrangement of the buildings equally strange customs prevail, and we have heard of four churches within a short distance of each other in which the chancel, or the apology for it, is placed respectively at the four points of the compass. The architecture is, as a rule, decidedly "nondescript," or in adopt a happy phrase from a recent publication, "Ebenezeresque." Proprietary chapels, over the buying and selling of which there is occasionally no slight tumult, are to be seen dotted about in this favoured neighbourhood, while there is scarcely a church which is not well fitted with the Bishop of Winchester's abomination—"galleries." In the supply of that erratic class of ecclesiastical functionaries—rergers—there is the utmost liberality; while the fashion and flowing nature of their robes sometimes puts to shame the less ample folds of the preacher. In parish clerks, again, the district is rich; and we venture to predict that if these estimable functionaries could be gathered together in one room and ordered to repeat the Athanasian Creed, each remembering that he is (or is considered to be) the mouthpiece of the congregation, the result would be a general demand for monotonic recitation. The musical arrangements are scarcely less quaint Kyries are sung to the most extraordinary specimens of so-called Church music, with variegated accompaniments; while in one church in Lambeth this favourite opportunity for musical display is only taken advantage of after the tenth Commandment, the petition after the others being relegated to the ordinary mumble. In attitudes, the aspect of some of the congregations would present a study worthy of a Hogarth; while if there is another point in which the South is unequalled, it is in the dismal character of its solitary church bells.

From such a choice locale, with all the furrowed lines characteristic of the "use of the last three hundred years" stamped unmistakably on the brow of each member of the deputation, did the Camberwell magnates go forth last week on their pilgrimage to Winchester House. Accustomed for the past thirty years to regard their diocesan as a far-off star in the ecclesiastical firmament, the worthy men suddenly awoke to the fact that the wearer of lawn sleeves is at times capable of descending to the common ground and of talking to men like a man. Thus, when they poured forth their woes into the Episcopal ear, drawing touching pictures of the agony of being compelled to drop their offerings in a bag instead of placing them in a plate, enlarging on the evils of "intoning," and condemning the use of the surplice, the Bishop met them at once in the most soothing manner by assuring them that he saw that it was a fear for the future more than an objection to the present mode of conducting the service which had excited their anxiety. His Lordship then proceeded to defend the practice of intoning where the clergyman is capable of a musical recitation, and he explained, in the most distinct manner, the advantages arising from it, viz.—that the voice can be more easily heard, and that it marks the distinction between the utterance of the clergyman when he is acting as the mouthpiece of the people in praying to or praising God and when he is addressing his own words to men. The question of Offertory Plates is one which does not fall within our province; but it may be well to add that the Bishop spoke very pointedly in favour of the Weekly Offertory. Thus ended the two hoursand a half which the aggrieved parishioners of St. Giles's, Camberwell, spent with their Ordinary.

On the importance of the Bishop's outspoken defence of the choral service especially when its rarity in the district is remembered, we need hardly say a word; it was simply what might have been naturally expected; but, if we may point a moral to adorn our tale, it is to express our hearty thanks to his lordship for having so emphatically taken the bull by the horns, and removed by a little explanation the cause of the grievance under which these persons were suffering, thus suggesting how many similar troubles might be overcome by a corresponding course of action on the part of other members of the Episcopal bench. Ignorance and misconception are the great evils against which we have to contend, and well will it be for the English Church when each one of her Bishops devotes himself to their removal after the manner of the Bishop of Winchester.

Shaker Silber across "Chilperic."

If a house "crowded to suffocation" be a sign of success, nothing could be more successful than M. Hervé's Chilperic on Saturday at the Lyceum Theatre. At what time the performance terminated we are not in a position to say. At twelve o'clock the house was still crowded, the "suffocating" point still maintained, and still an act to come. Several songs and dances had been encored; but if the work had been performed without interruption, the representation, notwithstanding the vivacity of M. Hervé, would still have been intolerably long. Chilperic is just one of those pieces which could only see the light in France, where a people, accused of restlessness and levity, submit to a despotic government, a rigid system of administration, five-act tragedies in verse and five-act farces in prose. Chilperic is only a three-act farce, but it is set to music; and the music, dance, and endless talk make up a whole seldom equalled for wearisomeness. Chilperic may be compared to human life—" of which," says Bossuet, in his letter to Father Caffaro on dramatic performances, "inexorable wearisomeness constitutes the very substantial." It is the "inexorable wearisomeness" which left to itself might drive us all to religion, that dramatist and actor, with diabolical perversity, seek to dispel; for which reason dramatist and actor are accursed; though to this rule, there are, of course, exceptions. Bossuet would never have held that the three gentlemen who adapted Chilperic to the English stage had lost all hope of salvation. Indeed, by reason of the "inexorable wearisomeness" which, instead of dispelling, they promote, he would have looked upon them as already numbered among the blessed. Hervé, like Wagner, writes his own opera books; nothing, we fancy—not even the interposition of his translators—could save him from the anathema of the Church. He absolutely exceeds from time to time in dispelling the wearisomeness of his own piece.

Chilperic is not only a three-act farce but a three-act historical farce; and not only a three-act historical farce but a three-act historical farce of a period beyond the sympathy, interest, and knowledge of the majority of English playgoers. Chilpéric, Pharamond, Clovis, are names and nothing more to the majority of English playgoers. If every man who entered the Lyceum on Saturday had been asked by the check-taker—"What was Chilpéric?"—nine-tenths would not have been unable to give any answer, while of the remaining tenth more than one-half would have replied, "It is a burlesque opera by Hervé."

The work opens, like Norma, with a chorus of Druids. Here, all resemblance between Hervé and Bellini ceases to an end. No, there is another point of similarity:—Chilpéric, like Pollio, becomes entangled with two women, Frédégonde, a peasant girl, whom he appoints mistress of his wardrobe, and Gaisuinda, a Spanish princess, whom he ultimately marries. The duet of reconciliation between Frédégonde and Chilpéric, when the separation takes place, reproaches are exchanged, and presents returned, reminds us of a similar duet between Norma and Pollio. It is good all the same, the effect being heightened by the dancing of Chilpéric—backwarding, retiring, and gesticulating all the time that Frédégonde upbraids him.

M. Hervé was originally intended for the Church, which adds piquancy to the fun inseparable from his grotesque but expressive gestures, and from the reckless style of his dance-music. The music of Chilpéric is throughout as rhythmical as dance-music can possibly be. It is often melodious, and one or two of the concerted pieces (especially the quartet for Chilpéric, Frédégonde, Irmehand, and Sigebert) are bustling. But it is in the finale that M. Hervé (like the great composers of serious and comic opera) loves to strike his blow. The umbrella finale of the first act, in which Chilpéric and his courtiers are surprised by a storm, and that of the second when Chilpéric and courtiers dance the cancan, are models of the appropriate as exhibited by Fellx Dramatiques. Both were received with enthusiasm, and repeated. We have heard the sextet in the Lucia encored, also the last movement in the Noce in Egitto; but never until Saturday did we hear two finales encored in the same opera. It must be remembered, however, that in Lucia none of the characters dance the cancan.

Let us add, to prevent misconception, that this dance, of which so much has been written, and which deserves the ill-repute attached to it, is executed with propriety at the Lyceum. The exposure of limb is not indecency, but grotesqueness, heightened by a certain impertinence of gesture. It is not a dance in which a mother would wish her girls to be instructed; but as performed at the Lyceum, there is no reason at all why she should not take them to see it.

M. Hervé made a hit as Chilpéric. He is full of droll humour of a sympathetic kind. M. Marius, who played the peasant Landry, Frédégonde's lover, produced also a favourable impression. His body seems made without hinges, and he telegraphs with all his limbs. Native talent, too, was adequately represented, Miss Emily Muir, in particular, achieving a decided success as Frédégonde. Miss Muir is a good singer and acts with much spirit. Orchestra good, ballet good, scenery good, costumes good. ✠Daver Bitter.

EPICHARMUS THE INVENTOR OF COMEDY.*

The origin, shrouded in the obscurity of the early middle age, of the modern drama has exercised the patience of generation after generation of antiquarians in every country of Europe. It is still uncertain to what extent the Mysteries and Miracles of the fourteenth century were a new invention, or were directly descended from the Roman theatre of the fifth century. There are "convulsionists," in literary history as well as in geology, who like epochs without antecedents. To others nothing begins to be; all is progress and development. "Lord Dundreary" derives in a right line, through Gammer Gurton's Needle, from the Chester Mysteries. The miracle-plays are but the Christianising of the popular forces which survived the regular drama on the wreck of the theatres, by the barbarians, in the sixth century. Every larger municipal town had its theatre, in which, to the last, Plautus might be occasionally seen. But Plautus carries us back already to A.C. 200, and to the Greeks, of whom Plautus was confessedly a copyist. Mounting upwards we ascend rapidly through the New, the Middle, and the Old Comedy. But comedy and tragedy —the drama altogether—is exclusively Attic. "If any Greek in a distant part," says Plato, "has written what he thinks a passable tragedy, he posts off with it to Athens. If it succeeds there, he is secure of a reputation wide as Greece." The Attic stage, and its Festivals of Dionysus at Athens, were the nursery of the comic drama of Europe. The nursery only, not the birthplace; for this we must go one stage further back. Doric, not Attic, was the native dialect of comedy. The earliest Attic writers of the "old comedy" drew their inspiration from abroad. Chionides and Magnes professed to build upon the foundation of the Megarian pantomime. It is in Epicharmus, of Doric Megara, that written comedy acknowledges its ancestor and inventor, and the era of its birth accordingly is between 480-500 B.C. Epicharmus had no predecessors, no models. He has been copied and adopted by many followers, but had himself none to copy. Beyond Epicharmus the tradition of the comic stage does not ascend.

What was Epicharmus? How came he to invent comedy? What are his plays like? These are questions of classical scholarship, but also of an interest wide as literature. Of course they are questions only to be answered from the plays themselves. Epicharmus, though not so prolific as M. Scribe, was no less fertile than writers for the stage usually are. But time has engulphed it all—all save about three hundred scattered lines, which have floated like so much wreck to the shore of our modern age. Of these three hundred lines some thirty or forty are suspected as spurious; that is, though found quoted from Epicharmus, are thought not to have been written by him. At least as many more are so corrupt that they defy emendation or conjecture. For these and other reasons there remain barely two hundred lines out of which the classical palæontologist may attempt to reconstruct a living image of the first comic poet, whose "works," in the Alexandrine recension of them, filled ten volumes.

This desperate undertaking was attempted six years ago by a German philologian, Herr Lorenz.[a] The three hundred lines require about as many pages for their elucidation. At first sight, we could not help suspecting these proportions of having something to do with professorial book-making. We were, therefore, agreeably surprised to find that very little could fairly be set down to this common sin of monographs. Even the first chapter, on "the Doric Drama," though it did but go over again ground thoroughly beaten by K. O. Müller, forms an indispensable prologue. The Life of Epicharmus had been well worked up by Bernhardy in Ersch and Gruber's Encyclopädie, but some few gleanings were still left. If Herr Lorenz anywhere indulged in superfluities, it was in the fifth chapter, in which, for want of materials, the growth of comedy was traced hypothetically. On the whole, we close his treatise with a satisfied conviction how much can be done from how few data, how certain the process of restoration is, and how clear is the line which, in historical philology, separates sound induction from fanciful suggestion.

Epicharmus was worth pains, for he was a very remarkable man. The inventor of comedy could hardly have been other. Epicharmus was no mere droll who set himself the task of amusing a rabid populace and a luxurious sovereign. He had appropriated all the best philosophical thinking of his age —the age of Xenophanes and Heraclitus. He, and probably his father before him, had been taught in the schools of the Pythagoreans, even if he had not known Pythagoras himself. More than this, Epicharmus was himself an original and powerful thinker, though he has not given his name to a particular system of opinion. Ennius entitled a Pythagorean didactic poem, Epicharmus, and one Alcimus wrote an essay (not extant) in which he tried to show that Plato's Dialogues had drawn largely from Epicharmus' comedies. So much we may assert of him, even if we do not (like Lorer) ascribe to him a philosophical poem, Of Nature, on precarious evidence. Though the allusion in Horace is peculiar, yet in that passage, (Theætet., p. 152) it is not without significance that Homer and Epicharmus, on the one side, are set over against Protagoras, Heraclitus, and Empedocles on the other.

The invention of comedy demands the very highest gifts of mind, and especially this broad and philosophical knowledge of human nature. For the invention of comedy is not merely the invention of intrigue and plot, and its dénouement, drawn to a climax through a succession of scenes, of laughable situations, and ridiculous contrasts of character. It is all this, but it is much more. All true joking, as Jean Paul says, implies depth of character; moral indifference annihilates the distinction between jest and earnest, and in such a soil they cease to be. It is only experience, ripened by reflection, which enables us to see that the follies and errors of mankind have not merely a ridiculous side, but that they are so many indications of a one-sided undeveloped nature—that they spring from mental deformity, the consequence of a cramped education and a defective experience. No comic writer has attained greatness who has not placed himself on this platform. This witty irony which sympathizes with, and pities, while it understands, its victims, is the very rarest of intellectual gifts. Mockers, scoffers, persifleurs—Aristophanes and Lucian, Swift and Voltaire—belong to another, and an inferior, type. Rebelaisian laughter is compounded of vulgar elements, and all its philosophy consists in referring men's acts to selfish and sensual motives. Its satire is a sneer, and the scum of its wisdom is to deny the existence of virtue.

True comic genius is the opposite of this. Its sportive laugh is directed, not in bitterness against human nature, but against its foibles. It pays the highest homage to virtue, tending always towards an ideal perfection. It is of the utmost significance, then, that the first of comic poets, in the Platonic style Epicharmus, was a man of thorough philosophic culture. Only such a one was capable of opening the true vein of comedy. Of course the inventor of comedy owed much to suggestions and opportunities. Educated, if not born, in the Sicilian Megara, he was familiar from childhood with the broad forms of popular wit and street chaff. Of all the Doric towns, Megara distinguished itself by its turn for coarse banter and practical joke. Here, from of old, the Bacchus festivals were celebrated with all the wild license of the vintage season, with the personalities, the repartees, the home thrusts for which the Doric race and dialect were famous. The mimes and the murmurs, and the processions of the jolly Comastæ, in their harlequin dresses of many colours, were here at home. The waggon for a stage, the cork-tree bark for a mask, the adventures of Dionysus the wine-giver for a subject, the song and dance of the peasants for accompaniment—the materials of comedy were all ready to hand. All that was wanting was the master-mind to weave these elements into one whole, to exalt the charicuri of October to the dignity of poetry. We can easily imagine—certainly we cannot prove—the upward steps by which a genius and a training like that of Epicharmus advanced from rude farce to the true conception of comedy. We can imagine him in his mythological travesties—in Pyrrha and Prometheus, or Hebe's Wedding—giving the reins to his youthful exuberance, and lashing out on all sides strokes fair and foul upon the civic notabilities, where, as in a small town like Megara, everybody knew everybody. As he became conscious of his powers, he removed to a larger sphere, to Syracuse. This city had been at the moment of Epicharmus' visit in dour. Under Gelo and Hiero, Syracuse stood at the head of the Greek world. It was the most populous, the most wealthy, and the most civilised city in which the Greek tongue was spoken. If more refined wit and greater caution were here required, at least an audience was obtained capable of appreciating them both. Along with wealth and civilization followed, of course, luxury and vice. The bourgeois of Syracuse was notoriously fond of good living and the pleasures of the table. It is to this that we owe the preservation of a large part of the few scraps of Epicharmus which the grammarians have preserved; they contained ent-of-the-way words—the names of peculiar Syracusan dishes or cakes. But the Syracusan loved good talk along with his good cheer. The lively, cheerful, chatty temper of the Greek Sicilian was almost proverbial. It did not forsake him even under the worst of tyrannies—that of a debauched Roman Proconsul. "Nunquam tam male est Siculis, quin aliquid facete et commode dicant," says Cicero. Under Gelo, provided you did not touch upon home politics, no doubt there was a free career for the dramatic satirist. And Hiero was the munificent patron of every kind, but especially of wit and humour. This was the very sphere for the comic drama, and all that was wanting was the poet. Epicharmus came, and created comedy. To this man was given the eye to see that underneath the rough repartee and rude witticism of the common man there lies a deep principal, which pervades all life; that these are but the ill regulated outbreaks of an ideal necessity, which is ever prompting to place the bad and the imperfect in sharp contrast with the excellent and the perfect. Vice is not the direct object of comedy. Vice is the object of satire; it is not laughable. To have been the first to seize this point of view is to have been the inventor of comedy. This is the invention which is associated for ever with the name of Epicharmus.

Miss Somers showed executive powers of a high order."

The Italian Opera is being rather roughly handled in Philadelphia. The papers says it has a "miscegenation chorus—that Maretzek has nothing to do with the management of the affair, but that it is "run" by an Italian gentleman of the name of Levy. Can this be so? We (Watson) admit that it is possible, for we have heard the name of Levy before.

Miss Rose Hersee has been singing at St. Louis lately with the Parepa-Rosa trompe. St. Louis Times speaking of the performance of Fra Diavolo, thus writes about Miss Hersee:—

MUSIC HATH NOT ALWAYS CHARMS.—M. Gresland, a manufacturer of Paris, is owner of a large piece of land, on which he has established his works and taken up his residence. The City of Paris owns the adjoining plot, and has fixed a school there. The authorities made openings looking upon the other's premises, which he at first paid no attention to, never imagined that they would prove a nuisance; but the three hundred children assembled learn to read by singing altogether a monotonous tune, extremely disagreeable to him. M. Gresland, in consequence, brought an action against the Prefect of the Seine to cause the openings to be closed, and the Civil Tribunal has now given his sanction to that course, and ordered the city to pay a fine of 50f. for each window made.

We read the following in the Daily News:—

"Is there a cure for the venom of a snake? Hitherto we know that the bites of venomous snakes have formed the despair of medical science. Reports from Australia, however, assure us that Professor Halford has discovered a remedy in the injection of ammonia. Two instances of success are recorded from Victoria. In one case an hour and a half had elapsed before the application; in the other, thirteen or fourteen hours—yet both ended in rapid recovery. We are so accustomed to hear some infallible cure for hydrophobia, which proves to be no cure at all, that we read this with reserve; yet the reports are so persistent, that they deserve attention."

Why not try injections of ammonia in hydrophaie cases?

A correspondent of the Gaulois, speaking of a delay in the first performance of Frou-frou at Rome, tells us that in the "Eternal City" there is not one censor, but three censors—a censor for politics, a censor for religion, and a censor for costumes and morality! If each of these censors could have his own way, very little of any piece submitted to them would be left. But, fortunately, the political censor thinks the religious censor absurdly strict; the religious censor has no patience with the severity of the political censor; and both object to the excessive prudery manifested by the censor for costume and morality. In short, each of the three censors is controlled by the other two, and Frou-frou would have passed without correction or protest, and would have been produced without delay but for an accident which obviously concerned the censor for costume: at the last moment the heroine's dresses had not arrived.—The Graphic.

The following slashing criticism appears in Watson:—

"Mr. Wm. Bergé was the organist and his performance was very mediocre. He treats the instrument as he would a cast-iron piano, and thrashes it unmercifully. Under his hands it has neither grandeur nor sweetness. His extemporaneous performance was unworthy of a dull school-boy. It was without form, totally deficient in imagination, a mere jingling together of common-place subjects, half Italian stretti and half polkas, and none of them amounting to a melody. The beginning had no reference to the end, nor the middle to either. His attempted delineation of a storm was but a tempest in a tea-pot, and could only be recognized as an elemental war through the mechanical appliances, which he uses very badly. His combinations are rarely effective, and never beautiful; his modulations are awkward, and his resources in harmony very limited; his use of the solo stops is generally ineffective, from the fact that sufficient support is not given by the left hand, which is constrained in consequence of the pedals only being used as a double to the little finger and rarely, moving independantly. Sometimes, of course, in points d'orgue, he trusts himself to an independent bass, but rarely otherwise. It is idle to call this organ-playing, it is time that the public should ask themselves, whas they hear such a jumble of pointless erudities,—' What does it mean? Is it music?' And when they hear a tremendous bapping and jumping crash, in which the harmonies are so mixed up that the sequence cannot be distinguished, and the sound gasps instead of rolls, they shall say, 'Is this the grandeur of power, or of a muddle, a row, or a racket?'"

The transplantation of M. Balfe's Bohemian Girl to the city from which that most cosmopolitan of damsels originally sprang, has recalled an incident which occurred during the rehearsals of his Puits d'Amour at the Opéra Comique in 1843. This, by-the-bye, being the only opera by the English composer known to French journalists, is coolly put down by them as being the last he wrote. A Parisian's world is bounded by the boulevards. At the time that the "puits d'amour" was being dug, M. Auber was much interested in the career of Madame Anna Thillon, and obtained for her an engagement to play the chief character. The post of honour was the post of danger. The heroine has to leap into the puits which gives its name to the piece, and the considerate maestro was sorely concerned lest the prima donna should break some bones in the "well of love." There were mattresses galore, but M. Auber was not satisfied; he so worried every one concerned, that at last the stage-manager lost all patience, and cried out, "Well, if you are so much interested in Madame Thillon, you had better try it yourself." No sooner said than done. The Director of the Conservatoire was at that time under sixty; with the impetuosity of youth, he leaped into the well, and "came up smiling"—only to meet other smiles, however, which were dangerously significant. Among the strollers was Madame Thillon's husband, to whom the composer said, I am still not at all convinced about Madame's safety; she is much stouter than I am. Now you are of about the same size; if you jump in and are not hurt, there will be no cause for fear." The husband did as he was bid—as husbands always do—and that gay young spark, the author of the Rêve d'Amour, had the laugh on his side after all.—The Graphic.

Five times in the course of the twenty-four hours are the faithful Turks summoned to prayer by the (generally blind) Muezzin; the first time a little after sunset, next at nightfall, then at daybreak, further at noon, and, finally, when the sun begins to decline. There are, however, two other calls to prayer besides, during the night, to raise pervent desirous of performing supererogatory acts of devotion. A little after midnight is the time fixed for the first of these two calls, which is therefore called "Ulah." We quote Mr. Deutsch (Quarterly Review, Art. "Islam," p. 343):—

"May be, some stray reader remembers a certain thrill an waking suddenly in the middle of his first night on Eastern soil—waking, as it were, from dream to dream. For there came a voice, solitary, sweet, sonorous, floating from on high through the moonlight stillness—the voice of the blind Muezzin, singing the Ulah, or first Call to Prayer. At the second whereof many a white figure would move silently on the low roofs, and not merely, like the palm and cypresses around, bow his head, but prostrate, and bend his knees. And the sounds went and came, 'Allah Akbar. . . . Prayer is better than sleep. . . . There is no God but He. . . . He giveth life, and He dieth not. . . . Oh! Thou Bountiful. . . . Thy mercy ceaseth not. . . . My sins are great, greater is Thy mercy. . . . I extol His perfection. . . . Allahu Akbar!'"

And this reader may have a vague notion of Arabic and Koranic sound, one which he will never forget.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Paper contains the following eulogistic notice of Mr. and Mrs. Howard Paul, who are now starring in the States:—

"Although both of these artists are of the same race—the dominant Anglo-Saxon—they are nevertheless of different countries, and come from either side of the great herring-pond, denominated in romantic parlance, the Atlantic Ocean. Mr. Paul was originally an American, although whether he now calls himself one or not, it would be hard to say, as his reputation was first made, to a large extent, in England. Being naturally of a wandering disposition, and finding himself at a loss to obtain a livelihood in his native land, of a corresponding genius to his own, he set out upon his travels in search of one. Finally he brought up in Great Britain, where, as Fortune would have it, he found the very lady he was in search of—his present spouse. He is frankly to be congratulated upon the good luck that attended his search. Mr. and Mrs. Paul as husband and wife so admirably suited each other in public, and of course in private life. Admirable actor and actress as each of them are, they have both a rare musical organization, thoroughly adapted to the line of eccentric comedy in which Howard Paul is so pre-eminent as a master and his lady as a mistress. Indeed, as a comic vocalist, it would be difficult to name an actor who may be ranked as the gentleman's equal. At the same time, from their mutual assistance they are enabled to present the public with a much wider and larger range of character than any single artist—did he possess the versatile genius the versatility of the elder Mathews—could possibly do. Since their former visit to this country they have been 'starring' throughout England, and have now returned here with an added list of theatrical characterizations, which has at once stamped their success in the early weeks they have lately appeared, and which will very certainly be warmly received in New York, where they have left so agreeable a memory of their vivacity, their talent, and their capability of entertaining an audience, by what may be termed, without flattery, their unrivalled skill in personal eccentric comedy."

There appears to be want of harmony among the congregation of St. Mary's Church, Dumfries. One of the Scotch papers says that Provost Harkness lately resigned his office as conductor of the choir, and Mr. Wright was appointed in his place. On last Sabbath morning Mr. Wright appeared at the precentor's desk; but unfortunately for him there was also present, in the choir-seat, Mr. William Kerr, formerly a member of the choir, along with a number of male and female juveniles, who, it was presumed, were to assist in the singing. The tune chosen by Mr. Wright was Hebron, hitherto been led by a harmonium, but on Sabbath last the instrument was not used. When the minister gave out the 83rd Psalm verse 3, commencing "Oh send Thy light forth and Thy truth," Mr. Wright gave the key-note and commenced to sing "Invocation," but here Mr. Kerr and his young friends—for reasons best known to themselves—struck up "St. Ann's." The struggle between the two parties is described as having been very distressing. At length, Mr. Wright, seeing he had no chance of competing against such terrible odds, desisted, and the others sang on till the psalm was finished, but at such a pitch that their own voices could not do more than "tip" the higher notes. Several members of the congregation in the meantime picked up their bibles and left the church, and the minister took his seat in the pulpit, unable evidently to control his own feelings. It seems a melancholy business altogether, but it is perhaps as well that the minister has a difficulty in controlling his feelings, for possibly in may in a rash moment turn the whole party out of his church, and get on without singing until the rival performers have adjusted their differences outside the sacred edifice.

TULIPATAN QUADRILLE.

"Does anyone require a new Quadrille? Let him straightway become the purchaser of either or both the above, which are, without any exception, the most stylish, the most dashing, and the prettiest we know. We cannot choose between them; one is as good as another—another as good as one."—The Queen.

OFFENBACH'S SIX NEW SONGS, published this day with English words, price 3s. each. Extract from review in The Queen, October 23rd:—

"Mr. Kenney has skilfully and tastefully adapted original words to these truly characteristic songs, so that the lovers of Offenbach may enjoy any one of them in the first drawing-room in the land, without fear of offence to the most fastidious. We have said the music is characteristic, and that it is without doubt; but it is something more—it is both fresh and genial, and for light, unpretending music, we know of nothing prettier.

"No. 1. LOVE AND POETRY, is a graceful song for a mezzo-soprano in E flat, in a sentimental style.

"No. 2. SOME OTHER DAY, is a gay and sparkling bolero in A flat for soprano, if the highest note.

"No. 3. OUTWARD BOUND, is simple to a degree, but withal charming; melody and accompaniment alike being in good taste.

"No. 4. SEE YONDER BLOOMING ROSE, another song of the sentimental order, is for soprano; highest note G, and very elegant.

"No. 5. GENTLY GLIDES OUR SKIFF, a barcarole in F, the gem of the series, and as original a barcarole as we can call to mind. The song is perhaps best suited for a tenor; it is excellently vocal, and abounds in novel and piquant effects. If M. Offenbach had written nothing but this barcarole, we should still say that he is a very clever and original musician.

"No. 6. CUPID AND HYMEN, though less attractive than the other numbers, is not without merit, and will possibly please many, more than would better music."

A Comedy in Five Acts.

ACT II.

A room at Mr. Vivian's. Sofa and piano L., work-table and fire-place R. Susan and Tootle, entering together.

Susan. Are you the man from the theatre?

Tootle. Yes, young woman, I am the man from the theatre. That is to say, I am the prompter. Lord Walsingham sent me.

Susan. Then you had better wait.

Tootle. I will wait as long as you please. (Exit Susan.) So they are going to play at acting in this house! Ah, if they only knew what a serious business it is!

Isabel (outside). Susan, send to Bond Street at once. I am going out to dinner and must have the dress by six o'clock. (She enters.) You have not been long coming.

Tootle. As soon as I heard it was for you, ma'am——

Isabel. But you don't know me?

Tootle. I beg your pardon, ma'am.

Isabel. But how so?

Tootle. I've often seen you at the theatre, ma'am. I know your father, ma'am, also. I have seen him at the stage door, waiting for Miss——

Isabel (interrupting him). And what have you brought me?

Tootle. The part of Cleopatra, in Antony and Cleopatra, carefully written out, with all the business marked.

Isabel. The business?

Tootle. Yes, everything that has to be done and the way of doing it. You will find it very useful. In fact, you could not do without it. If, ma'am, you would like me to hear you read the part?

Isabel. Certainly I should. Just let me look at it. (Takes the book from him. A tap at the door is heard.) What is it? I am engaged.

Vivian (outside). It is I, my dear.

Isabel. Oh, it is you! Come in. (Enter Vivian.) This is Mr. Tootle. (To Tootle.) Let us go on, please.

Vivian. Oh.

Isabel. You know what it is? It is for that little piece I am to play in, Antony and Cleopatra. (Vivian makes a slight gesture of dissatisfaction.) You consented—besides it is for the poor. Mr. Tootle was going to hear me read the part.

Vivian. Well, I had something rather important to say to you. I am really very sorry to have interrupted you.

Isabel. Oh! then I will read the part another time. Another time, Mr. Tootle, another time.

Tootle (rising). Whenever you wish, ma'am. Always at your service, if you will only send word. 20, Judd Street, Tottenham Court Road, will always find me.

Vivian. Good morning, Mr. Tootle. [Exit Tootle.

Isabel. You know what it is for? The magnificent amateur performance that Lady Lorimer is getting up. (Sits down on the sofa.)

Vivian. And what will Lady Lorimer play in this magnificent amateur performance?

Isabel. Lady Lorimer will play nothing.

Vivian. Nothing at all?

Isabel. Nothing at all. She has enough to do with getting it up.

Vivian. That is so like Lady Lorimer.

Isabel. How so?

Vivian. She is very clever at making other people exhibit themselves, but you won't catch her exhibiting herself.

Isabel. You mean by that——

Vivian. I mean that you will be on the stage, while she will be sitting quietly in front looking at you and making her reflections.

Isabel. You don't like her.

Vivian. I neither like nor dislike her. I say that she is a clever woman, that is all.

Isabel. What am I then?

Vivian. The most charming, the most adorable little actress in the world.

Isabel. I am glad to hear it. But you had something to say to me?

Vivian. Yes.

Isabel (reading the part brought to her by Tootle). Well, what is it about?

Vivian. About something that may, perhaps, take us a very long way from Mr. Tootse.

* This version is sanctioned by the authors and published with their approval, in conformity with the requirements of the International Copyright Act of 1852 (signed H. Meilhac, Ludovic Halévy. Paris, January 26, 1870).

Isabel. Something serious, then.

Vivian. Very serious indeed.

Isabel (still reading). So much the better.

Vivian. My dear Isabel, I wanted for one moment——

Isabel. What is a débardeur's dress like?

Vivian. Really——

Isabel. No, no. However serious you may be you can't make me believe that you don't know what a débardeur's dress is like.

Vivian. Well, how shall I describe it? A débardeur's dress consists of a loose silk shirt, a pair of—let us say trousers, made of satin or velvet. I don't exactly know which.

Isabel. What besides?

Vivian. And buttons, quantities of buttons.

Isabel. What besides?

Vivian. A little cap on the side of the head.

Isabel. What besides?

Vivian. Nothing besides. That is all.

Isabel. I can't wear such a dress as that—not even for the poor. I won't think of something else. But I am listening to you, my love. What were you going to say?

Vivian. I saw the minister this morning.

Isabel (with vivacity). And did you ask him to come?

Vivian. Come where?

Isabel. To the performance.

Vivian. No, I did not speak about it, but I will. He was talking about my affairs. He wants me to go abroad again.

Isabel (alarmed). Abroad!

Vivian. It is quite clear that I can't get on in diplomacy by remaining in England.

Isabel. And what does he offer you abroad?

Vivian. Carlsruhe—the post of minister at Carlsruhe.

Isabel. Minister at Carlsruhe? Is it a good thing to be minister at Carlsruhe?

Vivian. Very good indeed!

Isabel. Ah! and how far is it from London to Carlsruhe?

Vivian. Oh, several hundred miles. It takes nearly thirty hours if you go through Paris.

Isabel. About as far as Baden-Baden?

Vivian. Baden is close by.

Isabel. Baden close to Carlsruhe? Why didn't you tell me at once?

Vivian. Baden is close by.

Isabel. Well, I will go and pass the summer at Baden with you, and the rest of the year you must come and see me as often as you can.

Vivian. Ah!

Isabel. Indeed, I make no promise—but it is not at all impossible that I shall now and then go and take you by surprise; but I make no promise.

Vivian. That is all very well, but——

Isabel (astonished). You surely did not think of taking me with you to Carlsruhe?

Vivian. Indeed I did.

Isabel. What, alone? Both of us alone all through the year?

Vivian. Well?

Isabel. But, my dear Henry, we should die—of happiness no doubt—but we should certainly die. Just think, my love, whether it's possible. What should I do without the London season? What would the London season do without me?

Vivian. Strictly speaking, I think the London season might do without you.

Isabel (with a look of doubt). Ah!

Vivian. But you without the London season?—certainly not!

Isabel. Well then?

Vivian. Well then, I see that I have one of two things to do. Either to go to Carlsruhe without you or to refuse the post.

Isabel. And?

Vivian. And I have made up my mind.

Isabel (with some anxiety). You are not going away without me?

Vivian. No. I refuse the post.

Isabel. Ah! that is admirable on your part.

Vivian. Admirable, is it? I am not at all sure of that. But what I am quite sure of is that I should not have the heart to do anything else.

Isabel. You still love me a little, then—after being married four years.

Vivian. Yes, I do love you, love you immensely, but I am afraid I do not love you in the proper manner.

Isabel. Oh yes you do, you do indeed. The best way for a man to love his wife is to do everything she wishes, because then the wife makes it a point of honour to do everything her husband wishes.

Vivian. Then, if I were to ask you a favour?

Isabel. After what you have just done for me, how can you have any doubt?

Vivian. Indeed?

Isabel. Indeed!

Vivian. If I asked you then not to play in this piece.

Isabel (dropping her arms). My dear Henry!

Vivian. Well?

Isabel. I thought you were going to ask something reasonable. How can I refuse now? It is impossible—and you will see how pretty I shall look. I must wear that curious débardeur's dress, but I will make some alterations in it, and I shall look so pretty and shall have so much success, and you will watch me from your corner of the room, and will say to yourself: that's my own little wife that they are applauding so much.

Vivian. Of course if you will have it.

Isabel. And you will be so pleased!

Vivian. Well, well. Then I will leave you.

Isabel. Where are you going?

Vivian. To the Foreign Office, to deliver my sensible answer. I shall look for George in the park as I am going along.

Isabel. Isn't George at home?

Vivian. No. The weather is so fine I thought he had better go out for a walk. He was not well this morning.

Isabel. Not well this morning?

Vivian. Did you not know it? But it is nothing serious.

Isabel. How could I know it? I said that they were to bring him into my room every morning. (Pulls the bell violently.) And this morning, now I think of it, they omitted to do so. [Enter Susan from the back.

Susan. You wish to try your dress on ma'am? It is quite ready.

Isabel. No, I was not thinking of that. Why was not George brought to my room this morning?

Susan. I did bring him to you ma'am, but you were asleep ma'am, and yesterday when we took him up to you and waked you up, you were rather cross.

Isabel. What?

Vivian (to Isabel). Never mind. Susan, leave the room! [Exit Susan.

Isabel. Rather cross? Impertinent girl!

Vivian. I told her to leave the room (smiling), but I must say I think she was perfectly right

Isabel (makes a sign of petulance).

Vivian. Well, I must go to the Foreign Office.

Isabel. Go! but give me a kiss first.

Vivian (kissing her). Ah, Isabel, Isabel!

Isabel. You must let me know what the minister says to you.

Vivian. Directly I have seen him.

Isabel. Don't be too long; you know I have to dine with Lady Lorimer to-day.

Vivian. Oh yes, that dinner party!

Isabel. Yes, that dinner party, from which all husbands are excluded, that we may have full liberty to talk of our costumes.

Vivian. Of your costumes, but not Lady Lorimer's, for she takes very good care to keep to her own.

Isabel. She must certainly have done something to annoy you. So you will dine at the club?

Vivian. No, I have some writing to do. I shall dine at home.

Isabel. What, all alone?

Vivian. Oh, with George I shall not be alone. Well, good-bye for the present. [Exit.

Isabel. With George he will not be alone! I know what he means, but nothing can be more unjust. (Looks at the clock.) Already ten minutes to four. (Sits down on the sofa.) As if I did not care for my child. I am as much with him as any mother I know of is with hers. I can't take him out in the park with his hoop (laughs). I don't know, though; I don't see why I shouldn't. He is such a nice little boy. But it is ten minutes to four, and at four o'clock Lady Lorimer comes with Lord Walsingham for the rehearsal, and I shall not know one word of my part.

Enter Royston.

Isabel. Ah, papa?

Royston. Well, do you know your part?

Isabel. Pretty well.

Royston. I wish I was going to be here to see you in it.

Isabel. So you will. But how is Louisa?

Royston. Louisa is quite well. As for me, I am going abroad.

Isabel. Abroad?

Royston. Yes. To-morrow evening.

Isabel. And where are you going?

Royston. To Bohemia.

Isabel (stifling her laughter). To Bohemia?

Royston. Yes, to Bohemia. What is there so laughable in that?

Isabel (laughing more and more). I don't know.

Royston. This requires some explanation, Isabel.

Isabel. I will tell you then. When you said you were going to Bohemia——

Royston. Well?

Isabel. A foolish idea came into my head.

Royston. What about?

Isabel. About the possibility of your finding yourself very much at home in Bohemia.

Royston. Isabel, this is not altogether becoming on your part.

Isabel. I did not want to say it. You know you forced me to it. So you will not be here to applaud me?

Royston. No, and I am very sorry for it.

Isabel. And what are you going to do in Bohemia?

Royston. I am going to spend three months at Prague.

Isabel. You have been appointed minister?

Royston. Minister?

Isabel. Well, some post at all events is—in the choreographic service. (Royston seems annoyed.) No. I don't mean anything. I beg your pardon, papa.

Royston. But you must really listen to me for a moment, I want to speak to you about Louisa.

Isabel. Oh yes, I forgot. Of course you can't take her with you.

Royston. Naturally——because (they look at one another; smiles; signs of intelligence exchanged), at all events I can't take her with me.

Isabel. Well, let her come here; let her come at once.

Royston. That certainly would be the best thing, but she wants to pass the whole time with your cousins in the North of Scotland.

Isabel. It is not the season for Scotland. The idea of such a thing! She shall come here, not for three months or for six months, but for ever, since she is absolutely determined not to get married. You know how fond I am of Louisa (kissing her father) and of you also, papa. You know that, however slighty I may be, I have really a great affection for you both. How often I have begged her to come and stay with us, and how decidedly she has always refused. I have been quite astonished at her per-sistence.

Royston. There is nothing astonishing in it. She thinks she might be in the way.

Isabel. We have twice as many rooms as we want.

Royston. No, that's not it. She is afraid she might interfere with your happiness.

Isabel. Ah! There might have been something in that during the first fortnight, but when we have been married four years.

Royston. Don't talk in that style to Louisa. She won't like it.

Isabel. All I shall do will be to say everything I can to make her stay with us. Send her to me, or shall I go and fetch her?

Royston. It is useless, she is coming to see you this very day. All you need do when once you have her here is to keep her.

Isabel. And I will, if I have to lock all the doors. As for being in the way, she need not be at all afraid of that.

Royston (assuming a serious air). I don't like to hear you say such things. Are you unhappy? Does your husband?—— If so, it will be my duty——

Isabel (as if laughing at him). Oh papa, papa!

Royston. I repeat that my duty as a father——

Isabel. Who is it you are going to take to Prague? (Royston makes a deprecatory gesture.)

Servant opens the door. Enter Lady Lorimer.

Lady L. Can I come in?

Isabel. Certainly.

Royston. I am delighted to see you, Lady Lorimer, delighted to have an opportunity of shaking hands with you before my departure.

Lady L. You are really going to Prague? A foreign engagement, I suppose?

Isabel (laughing). That was my idea, also.

Royston (to Isabel). Don't believe one word of anything Lady Lorimer may tell you. (Kisses her.) I will come and see you before I leave, you and Louisa also, for I am sure you will persuade her to stay.

Isabel. Certainly, I will.

Royston. Good-bye, then, until to morrow (shakes hands with Lady L.), good-bye.

Lady L. Good-bye, Bohemian. You will feel at home in your native capital.

Royston (solemnly). Lady Lorimer, you are mistaken. Look at my grey hair.

Lady L. (looking at Royston's hair, which is dyed). Your what?

Royston. I am always forgetting that I did not consider myself worthy to wear it.

Isabel (walking towards him). What do you say?

Royston. Nothing, good-bye. [Exit.

Lady L. (sitting down on the sofa). What was your father saying to you just now? That you were sure to keep Louisa—keep her where?

Isabel. Why, here!

Lady L. Here!

Isabel. Yes, Louisa is coming to stay with us while papa is away, and when she is once here, I hope——

Lady L. You hope?

Isabel. I hope she will remain.

Lady L. (pointedly). Ah! (A pause.) And she will go with you to Carlsruhe?

Isabel. To Carlsruhe?

Lady L. I suppose you are going there? Mr. Vivian is appointed minister.

Isabel. No, indeed, I am not going to Carlsruhe.

Lady L. Is he going by himself?

Isabel. He is not going at all—he has refused.

Lady L. Accept my compliments, my love. That is something like devotion (laughs). After that it is superfluous to ask you whether he consents to your taking part in the amateur performance?

Isabel (shaking her head). Oh, as to that, as a matter of course, he consents, but——

Lady L. Do you know your part?

Isabel. Pretty well, with the exception of the last scene.

Lady L. We had better rehearse it, then.

Isabel. I think so. I have rehearsed part of it already.

Lady L. With whom?

Isabel. With papa.

Lady L. With papa? What a thing it is to have such a father. He is a perfect treasure. Did I tell you that everything was going on so well? It is your piece, you know, and you will take the money. The receipts will be enormous. Just fancy, I have already sold twenty tickets at a guinea apiece.

Isabel. Sold them?

Lady L. It is for the poor, and all my friends will be obliged to take tickets.

Isabel. Yes, if you don't mind asking them.

Lady L. Not in the least. It is for the poor.

Isabel. But if people pay so much money they will be difficult to please.

Lady L. Oh no. And if they are, you will look charming in the part of Cleopatra, and Lord Walsingham will not be at all bad as Antony.

Isabel (interrupting her). Yes, when he has made up his mind to learn his part.

Lady L. Oh, he will know it well enough. He has one very important qualification for the character—he is over head and ears in love with his Cleopatra.

Isabel. Lord Walsingham in love! What are you talking about?

Lady L. Certainly he is.

Isabel. How can you, who know him so well, entertain such a wild idea.

Lady L. It is precisely because I know how Lord Walsingham behaves when he pretends to be in love, that I am sure what I say is true. For once he is seriously, hopelessly in love, and I really believe it is the first time in his life.

Isabel. You are talking nonsense, my dear.

Lady L. Do you think so?

Enter a Servant.

Servant. Lord Walsingham.

Enter Lord Walsingham.

Lady L. Well, we shall soon see.

Walsingham. How do you do, Lady Lorimer?

Lady L. How do you do? Why don't you congratulate Mrs. Vivian?

Walsingham. Congratulate her?

Lady L. The news was quite true. Mr. Vivian has been appointed minister at Carlsruhe, and they start next week.

Walsingham. Oh!

Lady L. Directly after the performance.

Walsingham (with emotion). Are you really going away?

Lady L. (aside to Isabel). Well! what do you say now?

Isabel (a little embarrassed). Let us go on with the piece.

Lady L. (to Lord Walsingham). No, she is not going away. How could she?

Isabel. Go on with the piece, go on with the piece.

Walsingham. Yes. Where shall we begin?

Isabel. I want to see how the last scene is done. We have not rehearsed it yet.

Walsingham. I don't quite know the last scene myself.

Isabel. Neither the last scene nor the first.

Walsingham. What! you think I don't know my part. What a thing to say, when I was up all last night studying it! There, I will do it without the book. I will go through it from beginning to end without the book. (To Lady L.) But you must prompt me.

Lady L. (laughing). Don't be afraid.

Isabel. What are we to do for scenery.

Walsingham. Scenery! Here is the scenery (placing two chairs together in the middle of the stage). There is the wall which separates the two rooms; there, between these two chairs, is the door (he places a third chair). Cleopatra in her room, Antony in his.

Isabel. Not at all. In the last scene——

Lady L. Cleopatra is in Antony's room.

Walsingham. And Antony in Cleopatra's; you are quite right. Are you ready?

Isabel. We are ready. (To Lady L.) And you my dear?

Lady L. I, as usual, will be stage-manager. Give me the book. (Isabel gives her the book. She sits down on the sofa.) Now then, go on.

Isabel. We begin from the arrival of the man with the execution. A voice is heard out-side. Cleopatra is alarmed.

Walsingham. Then Antony goes on——and you say I don't know my part (acting). "They have come to seize my furniture and everything that belongs to me."

Isabel (acting). "Oh, dear! then they'll seize me."

Lady L. Very good.

Isabel. Yes. That is a point. "Oh, dear! then they'll seize me."

Lady L. Now, Lord Walsingham. "Ah! transporting confession——"

Walsingham. Oh, I know it by heart. "Ah! transporting confession—you are mine!"

Isabel. "Yes, yes, my beloved hussar."

Lady L. "Voice without. Will you open the door?"

Walsingham. "At such a moment. Unfeeling scoundrels! Ah, Cleopatra, my angel, open the door. I'll remove the furniture into your room."

Isabel. "Into my room?"

Walsingham. "What does it matter, when we are going to be married."

Isabel. "In a church."

Lady L. You should say that more quickly—with more emphasis.

Isabel. Did not I say it properly?

Lady L. No, you said it like this (imitating her): "In a church."

Isabel. Let us have the passage again, Lord Walsingham.

Walsingham. With pleasure. "What does it matter when we are going to be married?"

Isabel (with more point). "In a church?" Is that right?

Lady L. Quite right!

Isabel (repeating the words with the same point). "In a church?"

Walsingham. "Of course. Please open the door."

Isabel. "Wait a moment." What do I do then?

Lady L. (reading from the book). "Cleopatra unbolts the door."

Walsingham. And Antony passes into her room. "Lovely Sylphide!" (he approaches Isabel as if to kiss her).

Isabel. What are you doing? (she moves away from him).

Lady L. What is the matter?

Walsingham. Mrs. Vivian won't let me——

Lady L. Oh, yes, he is quite right; it is in the book. "Antony passes into the room and embraces her."

Isabel. Is it in the book?

Lady L. Yes, there is the passage (shows the book). "Antony passes into the room and embraces her."

Isabel. Well, we'll skip the passage.

Walsingham. How do you mean skip the passage? Why, that is the very reason why I accepted the part.

Isabel. The night of the performance perhaps I will——

Walsingham. Exactly so, and then I shan't do it well, simply because you won't let me rehearse it.

Isabel. Come, let us go on.

Walsingham (taking a seat). No, I won't rehearse any more.

Isabel. I appeal to the stage-manager.

Lady L. Oh, what can I say? He is perfectly right. It is in his part.

Isabel. You think he is right?

Lady L. I am sure of it.

Isabel. Then I must let him?

Lady L. It is for the poor!

Isabel (with more emotion than she likes to show). Well, since the stage-manager orders it.

Walsingham (also with emotion). "Lovely Sylphide!" (pauses, much confused).

Lady L. Now it is you who stop.

Walsingham. Yes, yes, but it is all through you.

Lady L. Through me? What have I to do with it?

Walsingham. I beg your pardon, Mrs. Vivian, I will begin again. (Very much agitated indeed.) "Lovely Sylphide!" (touches Isabel's hair with his lips).

(Door at the back opens and enter Louisa. General embarrassment. Louisa walks up to the chairs and stands still, looking rather surprised.)

Walsingham. Ah, take care, Miss Royston, take care (he places the chairs in their proper place).

Louisa. Thank you.

Isabel (to Louisa). We were just rehearsing.

Louisa. I am really very sorry to have interrupted you.

Lady L. For my part I am very much obliged to you, for we were getting so interested that we should have gone on to the end of the piece, and I should never have been home in time. (To Isabel.) Don't forget, mind, that you dine with me to-day.

Isabel. I shall not forget.

Lady L. Well, good-bye for the present. (In an undertone, pointing to Louisa, who has walked to the back of the stage.) And you really mean to persuade her to stay with you?

Isabel. Certainly!

Lady L. Indeed! Well, good-bye, Louisa. Are you coming, Lord Walsingham?

Walsingham. I am ready.

Lady L. (to Isabel). And when is the next rehearsal to take place.

Isabel. We will arrange that this evening.

Lady L. And you will let him know?

Isabel. I will let him know.

Digitized by Google

Walsingham (going out with Lady L.). I shall anxiously await the summons.

[Exeunt Walsingham and Lady L.

Isabel (kissing her sister). Ah, Louisa, Louisa!

Louisa. Well, Isabel?

Isabel (kissing her with more than ordinary tenderness). My dear Louisa!

Louisa (a little astonished). What is the matter with you?

Isabel. Don't you know?

Louisa. What?

Isabel. Such happiness, my dearest Louisa, such happiness!

Louisa. What is it?

Isabel. I should like to let you guess, but as I don't think you would guess right, I may as well tell you at once.

Louisa. Tell me?

Isabel. Suppose I had a sister.

Louisa. Well?

Isabel. A dear darling sister, and that after being separated from her for four years I suddenly found her again, and at the same time found an opportunity of keeping her with me for ever.

Louisa. But what do you mean?

Isabel. I mean what I say my dearest, Louisa: you will remain with me for ever now. You are here and you shall not go away. It's all arranged with papa.

Louisa. Indeed!

Enter Vivian.

Vivian. I heard you were here, Louisa; how are you (he shakes hands with her).

Isabel. Have you seen the minister.

Vivian. I have.

Isabel. And did you tell him?

Vivian. Yes, it's all at an end.

Isabel. Ah, how good of you! And, see, now to console you for not having a mission abroad, I will give you one at home—here in this very house.

Vivian. A mission?

Isabel. And a very important one I can tell you. Papa is going away from England for three months. You must persuade Louisa to pass these three months with us; these three months to begin with, and after these three three others.

Vivian. Oh, as for that——

Isabel. You must persuade her. I know you will be able to persuade her.

Louisa. But——

Isabel (interrupting her). What pretext can she have for refusing. That she is afraid of inconveniencing us? You must explain to her that she does not know what she is talking about, and you can prove to her that her presence here, instead of being inconvenient, would be very useful. You know what to say to her about it; you know that you can get her to do anything, if you only persuade her that it is a matter of duty. Tell her that there are all sorts of serious and even tiresome things to attend to here. She likes looking after such things, whereas I—— (To Louisa.) You must look after them for me. I hope you will, Louisa. I am saying all I can think of to make you stay. (To her husband.) Tell her that (abruptly.)—tell her, in short, whatever you think best, for I really have no more time to tell her anything. Oh, yes; one thing more. (To Louisa.) Our little George is so very fond of you. (Pointing to Vivian.) And as for him—just see what a good idea of yours it was to come to-day. You can dine with him. I give him up to you. You will take my place. (Louisa seems about to speak.) Not a word. It's all settled. I will tell them to put a knife and fork for you. (Kisses her sister as she says the words, and immediately afterwards exit.).

Vivian. You know that I won't have any more argument on the point. You remain with us. It is all settled.

Louisa. It is not settled at all.

Vivian (laughing). Not if I lose my temper?

Louisa. Oh, indeed!

Vivian. Not if I entreat you?

Louisa. Not even if you entreat me.

Vivian (seriously). You would render us a great service, however, by remaining. What is so much wanting in this house, would be wanting no longer.

Louisa. What is wanting then?

Vivian. A woman.

Louisa. What?

Vivian. I say that what is wanting here is a woman. And you know it though you pretend not to understand. (They remain silent for a moment.)

Louisa. What has been happening?

Vivian. Everything and nothing; always the same thing.

Louisa. But what?

Vivian. I adore Isabel.

Louisa. I know you do, but I don't see what harm——

Vivian (sitting down). You don't see?

Louisa. No.

Vivian. Then I will explain to you. This morning I was appointed—— you are aware of it, perhaps?

Louisa. Yes, I am aware of it.

Vivian. I informed Isabel of it, and she at once informed me that she never could think of accompanying me.

Louisa. What have you done, then?

Vivian. Done? I have refused the post.

Louisa. You have refused it?

Vivian. I gave it up as quietly as if I had been offering her a bouquet, though I knew all the time——

Louisa. You knew?

Vivian. I knew that I was putting an end to my career. I refused because I love Isabel, and she allowed me to refuse because she does not love me.

Louisa. My dear Henry?

Vivian. When you gave me Isabel, for it was really you who gave her to me——

Louisa. So it was.

Vivian. You said that I was just the husband for her, and that you should not be so much afraid of her flightiness when she was married to such a sensible person as myself. You did not know what this sensible person was capable of. The little faults in her character which alarmed you, and which, with a little firmness, I might have cured, remained because I would not see them. I loved her too much! I love her now as I loved her the day of our marriage, and that is why, four years afterwards, you find Isabel with those same faults somewhat developed.

Louisa. But the little boy?

Vivian. She adores him. During George's illness she passed a whole week by his bedside, taking an hour's sleep from time to time, when he seemed to be a little better. Sometimes she is with him for days together. Then she is whole weeks without seeing him, except perhaps for five minutes, when he gets up and when he goes to bed.

Louisa. Who takes charge of him then?

Vivian. The governess—or myself when I have time.

Louisa. What you tell me is really terrible!

Vivian. Yes, it is terrible; and if Isabel and myself are to go on in this way who knows how it will all end? Whereas if some one——

Louisa. If some one——

Vivian. Some one of a serious disposition would come to live with us and take the direction of a household which, at present, is not directed at all —would attend to the duties which Isabel forgets, and which I have not the heart to remind her of.

Louisa. But you ought!

Vivian (rising). I know perfectly well that I ought. But I also know that I cannot back. Now if some one else would undertake these duties for which she has no inclination and which must nevertheless be performed, the danger which threatens us would be much diminished. There are some situations of which it is really difficult to speak without smiling. On the one hand a frivolous wife, on the other a weak husband conscious of his weakness, but unable to correct it. The position has been known before, it will be known again, and that is really all there is in our position at this moment. It is dangerous, nevertheless, and the danger is one which neither Isabel nor myself can avert, but against which I think, most sincerely, that you would not be altogether powerless.

Louisa. Good heavens!

Vivian. Ah! Then you will stop with us! Isabel's idea was a happy one! Now that you know that in remaining with us you have a good work to perform——

Louisa (rising). You really think so?

Vivian. Yes, Louisa. In whatever way I may put it, it comes to that. All I have told you is true, terribly true, and nothing more fortunate could have happened to us than your arrival here, if you are really going to stay with us.

Louisa. I will stay!

Vivian. Thanks!

Enter a Servant, bearing lamps.

Louisa (aside). And that was their happy life!

Enter Isabel, showily got up in evening dress, followed by George, who is almost lost in his mother's petticoats.

Isabel (to the Servant). The carriage! Is the carriage at the door? (Exit Servant.) She is going to stay, is she not?

Vivian. Yes.

Isabel. What a good day's work! (She is moving towards Louisa when she finds that George has his foot on her dress.) Mind what you are doing. You will tear my dress! (She pushes him away rather roughly.)

Louisa. Come, George, come here.

Isabel. Yes, go to your aunt.

George. I should like to! (Goes to Louisa and kisses her.)

Isabel. See what a good idea it was to stay! You will all three dine together so pleasantly. Let me see you comfortably settled before I go. (To her husband.) There are your letters, your newspapers—your political food (she spreads out before her husband the letters and papers brought by the servant). You, Louisa, sit there by the side of the fire—in my place.

Enter Servant. (Vivian and Louisa sit down.)

Servant. The carriage is at the door, ma'am.

Isabel. Well, I must go. (She pauses at the door, turns round and looks at them.) You look charming, all three together! (Kissing her hand three times to Louisa.) One for you (pointing to the child, who is on his knees in front of the table, preparing his playthings), one for him, and one for you. (Exit Isabel. Vivian and Louisa look at each other. Louisa kisses the child.)

END OF ACT II.

SOMETHING ABOUT FRANZ SCHUBERT.

At the time the above letters were written, I was only slightly acquainted with Schubert, though I had heard him sing his songs on two or three occasions. His voice (une voix de compositeur) was something between a sweet tenor and a baritone; his style, simple and natural, full of feeling, and without the slightest affectation. In the winter of 1824-25, as a jurist of four years' standing, I was, what with the Vienna edition of Shakspere, and what with my own productions, overwhelmed with work. I was gradually accumulating innumerable dramas and comedies, among which was the Geschwister von Nurnberg, as well as subsequently Der Musicus von Augsburg, Fortunat, and other ideal and romantic effusions, with which, for the moment, practical, realistic managers would have nothing to do. But I still continued to work on without respite, and spent nearly all my evenings in my lonely room.

I was sitting, then, in that hermitage of mine, one evening, in the month of February, 1825, when my old friend, Schwind, came in, bringing with him Schubert, who was then already celebrated, or at least known. We soon became intimate. In compliance with Schwind's wish, I was obliged to read some absurd things I had written in my youth. We then went to the piano, and Schubert sang. We played, also, with four hands, and then adjourned to the tavern where we remained to a late hour of the night (I am vain enough to mention that it is to my continuous musical practice with my friend that I owe my tolerable skill in reading at sight).

The alliance was concluded. From that day forth, we three friends were inseparable. Others, too, gathered round us, most of them painters and musicians, and formed a circle of individualists, full of fun and life, animated by similar sentiments and similar aspirations, and sharing with each other their pleasures and their pains. First among them was that fine fellow, Schober, who, in the summer of 1825, at length arrived in Vienna.

Old age becomes from time to time garrulous, but it is only in youth that people have really something to tell each other, and have never finished doing so. Such was the case with us. How often did we three war about till nearly daylight, seeing one another home by turns, and not being able to part, not unfrequently passing the night at one or the other's rooms.

We were not very particular about comfort. Friend Moritz would, for instance, fling himself, merely wrapped in a leathern counterpane, upon the bare floor, and on one occasion, when a pipe was wanted, he cut up the case of Schubert's eye-glasses into one. As regards property, communistic ideas prevailed; hats, boots, neckhandkerchiefs, and even coats, as well as any other articles of apparel, that happened to fit him who required them, all formed one common stock, but gradually, if often worn by the same individual, who thus gained a kind of affection for them, became his undisputed private property. Whoever happened to be in cash paid for the other, or others. Sometimes it came to pass that two had no money, and the third only—the same. Of course, Schubert was the Croesus among us, now and then rolling in silver, when he had sold a song or two, or even a whole series, as, for instance, the songs of Walter Scott, for which Artaria or Diabelli paid him five hundred florins, Austrian currency, with which he was perfectly contented, and which he resolved to husband carefully, but, as was always the case, at once failed to do so. For a time, he spent the money freely, treating everyone—then came once more short commons. In a word, the tide was continually ebbing and flowing. It was to the fact of its being high water in Schubert's pocket, that I owe the pleasure of hearing Paganini. I could not manage the five florins that Concert-Pirate required. Of course, it was absolutely imperative that Schubert should hear him, but he would not go a second time without me. He grew quite angry when I refused to accept a ticket from him. "Nonsense!" he exclaimed, "I have heard him once, and I was savage you were not with me! I tell you there will not be another fellow like him! Money is a drug in the market with me at present, so come along!" and he dragged me off. Who would not, under the circumstances, have allowed himself to be persuaded? So we heard the infernally-celestial fiddler, on whose fantasias Heine has written such fine ones himself. We were so less entranced with his wonderful Adagio, than surprised at his diabolical dodges. We were, also, no less humorously edified at the incredibly ludicrous bows made by the demoniacal individual, who resembled a thin black doll upon wires. According to custom, I was taken to a tavern, and treated after the concert, a bottle more than usual being consumed and set down to the account of our enthusiasm.

That was when it was high tide! But there was a reverse to the medal. On another occasion, I went, early in the afternoon, to the café near the Kärthnerthor Theater, and ordered a "Melange" with which I eat half-a-dozen "Kipferl." Shortly afterwards, Schubert appeared and did the same. We were both surprised at our respective appetites being so good so shortly after dinner.

"The fact is I have not dined" said my friend, in a somewhat dejected tone. "No more have I," I replied, laughing. Without any previous arrangement, we had both come to the café, where we were well known, and had "stuck up" the "Mélange," instead of having a dinner, for which neither of us was that day in a position to pay. It was completely low tide with both of us.

It was under similar circumstances that the fact of our calling each other "Du," was celebrated in—sugar and water! Then again came the evening meetings, "Schubertiaden" as they were called, with jolly, high-spirited companions, when the wine flowed in streams; that good fellow Vogl sang all the splendid songs for our amusement, and poor Franz Schubert had to accompany them, till his short fat fingers would scarcely obey him any longer. But he was never off at our house parties —merely "Wurstelfälle" In those simple times—though there was no scarcity of pretty women, married and unmarried, at them. Our "Bertel," as he was occasionally called in a coaxing tone, had to play his best waltzes over and over again, till an endless cotillon was finished, so that it was only at the modest supper that the short, corpulent, manniken, bathed in perspiration, had a moment's rest. It was not astonishing that he sometimes escaped, and that many a "Schubertiade" had to be given without Schubert, if he did not, perchance, feel inclined for company, or some one or other among the persons invited did not particularly please him. It not unfrequently happened that he would let a whole party wait for him in vain, while he was sitting over a bottle, in some obscure wineshop, with half-a-dozen sabers, his former colleagues. When we reproached him, the next day, for his conduct, he would answer with a good-natured snigger: "I was not in the humour."

This is, perhaps, the proper place for correcting certain errors which circulate from time to time, regarding the easy-going, genial artist, especially among persons who have no small opinion of their own good breeding, as they call it. "It is not to be denied that Schubert, poor fellow, possessed talent, but he was totally deficient in polish, in good tone, and even in acquirements—nay, in every thing constituting a scholar or a gentleman," people used to say, and, at last, they were rather inclined to picture the genial songster as a kind of "drunken savage," as, in his day, the prosaic Voltaire designated that poetic giant Shakspere in terram Dispbini.

It is certainly true that Schubert had no regular University education; his studies had not extended much beyond the course prescribed at the Gymnasium, and he was a self-taught man, all his short existence. In his own branch of art, he was tolerably acquainted with the composers and models, and, under Salieri's direction, had applied himself sufficiently to theory, though, as I will afterwards relate, it was not till the last year of his life that he set about studying certain subjects, which he had previously neglected. In literature, too, he was anything but ignorant, and the poetic way, full of life, with which he could grasp the most different poetic individualities, such as Goethe; Schiller; Wilhelm Müller; J. G. Seydl; Mayrhofer; Walter Scott; and Heine; clothing them anew in flesh and blood, and faithfully reproduce in beautiful, noble, and characteristic music the idiosyncracy of each one—such instances of palingenesis should suffice, by the mere fact of their existence, and without any further proof, to show from what deep feeling, from how delicately strung a soul his creations flowed! Any one who so understands poets is a poet himself. And there is a great difference between a man who is a poet, and occasionally quaffs his wine in an Anacreontic spirit with his friends, and those who think as he does, and a drunken savage! This savage, too, read seriously; extracts exist in his own hand from historical and even philosophical writers; his diaries contain his own ideas, which are sometimes highly original, as well as poem-; and his favourite associates were artists, and persons connected with art. He entertained, on the other hand, a perfect dread of ordinary prosy individuals, and with regard to those narrow-minded beings, high or low, commonly called the educated classes, Goethe's exclamation:—

"Lieber will ich schlechter werden Als mich ennuyiren,"

was always his motto, as it was that of us all. In mediocre company, he felt isolated, uncomfortable, and oppressed, and easily grew ill-tempered, despite the great attention shown him when he was beginning to be celebrated. It was not, therefore, astonishing, if he sometimes at table took more than he could bear, and, by a few strong outlursts sought to free himself from the depressing influence of those around him, so that they started back in dismay. I myself witnessed a scene of this description, but, after all, it was more comic than reprehensible. It was one summer's afternoon. We had strolled out, with Franz Lachner and others, to Grinzing, for the purpose of having some of the new wine, a beverage of which Schubert was especially fond, though I myself never liked its sharp, acid taste. We sat talking pleasantly over the liquor, and did not walk back till It was dark. I wanted to go home at once, as I resided at that time in a distant suburb, but Schubert dragged me forcibly into a tavern. I was also obliged to accompany him to a café, where he was accustomed to finish his evening, stopping in fact till late into the night. It was one o'clock in the morning, and an exceedingly animated musical discussion had sprung up as we sat drinking hot punch. Schubert tossed off one glass after another, and fell into a sort of enthusiastic fit, and, more eloquent than usual, explained to Lachner and myself all his plans for the future. As fate would have it, a very unlucky star conducted into the café two musicians, celebrated members of the band at the Operahouse. On their entrance, Schubert stopped short in the midst of his animated harangue. His forehead grew wrinkled, and his small grey eyes glared wildly from beneath his spectacles, which he kept pushing ceaselessly backwards and forwards. Scarcely, however, had the musicians caught sight of the master, before they rushed up to him, seized hold of his hands, said a thousand complimentary things, and nearly crushed him with flattery. At length it came out that they were most anxious to have a new composition, with solos for their own particular instruments, for a concert they intended giving. "The maestro Schubert would as kindly be so obliging as to, etc., etc."

The master, however, appeared anything but so obliging, and made no reply. Being repeatedly pressed, he at length said curtly, "No! for you I will write nothing."

"Not for us?" said the musicians in amazement.

"No! most certainly not!"

"And why not, Herr Schubert?" was the reply, in an irritated tone. "I think we are as much artists as yourself! No better are to be found in all Vienna!"

"Artists!" exclaimed Schubert, hastily drinking the last glass of punch, and getting up from his seat. Then cocking his hat over his ear, the little fellow placed himself, as though menacingly, before the two virtuosos, one of whom was a big, and the other a corpulent man. "Artists!" he repeated, "Catgutscrapers, you mean. You are nothing more! One of you nibbles the brass mouthpiece of his wooden cudgel, and the other puffs out his cheeks by blowing down his French horn. Do you call that art? It is a mechanical trade, a knack, that brings in money, and there an end!—You, artists! Do you not know what the great Lessing says?—How can a man do nothing all his life but nibble the end of a piece of wood with holes in it?—that is what he says"—(turning to me)—"or something of the kind. Am I not right?" (Again addressing the virtuosos), "You pretend to be artists! You are only fiddlers and blowing machines, the whole lot of you! I am an artist, if you like. I am Schubert, Franz Schubert, whom everyone knows, and of whom every one speaks! A man who has written great things, and beautiful things which you are incapable of understanding—and who will write something still more beautiful."—(To Lachner): "is not that true, my boy?—Something very fine indeed! Cantatas and quartets, operas and symphonies! I am not merely a waltz-composer, as you see stated in the stupid papers, and as stupid men repeat—I am Schubert! Franz Schubert! Remember that! When the word ass is uttered, this speaker refers to me, and not to you, insects and worms, who ask for solos, which I will never write for you—I know why! You crawling, gnawing worms, you, whom I ought to crush beneath my foot—the foot of a man who touches the stars—sublimi feriem sidera vertice"—(to me): "translate that for them.—The stars, I say, while you, poor horn-blowing worms, wriggle in the dust, and with the dust as dust are blown about and rot."

Such a tirade, only verbally far worse, though I have faithfully reproduced its spirit, was that which he launched at the heads of the dumbfoundered virtuosos who stood gaping with their mouths wide open, and without being able to say a word in reply, while Lachner and myself endeavoured to get the excited composer away from what was, at any rate, a very unpleasant scene. We took him home, soothing him as we went along.

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

"CHILPERIC."

About M. Hervé's latest opera the Sunday Times speaks in this fashion:—

"We place our notice of Chilpéric in this column because we have no special department for opéra-bouffe. While doing so, let us make a thousand apologies to music. Less than a thousand will hardly suffice. The offence is rank, and may well be past forgiveness. Imagine the space usually devoted to that which is noble and elevating given up to that which is—well, neither! Imagine us as introducing to Handel and Beethoven, and the goodly fellowship of great musicians, a composer like M. Hervé? The idea is absurd; all the more because opéra-bouffe and M. Hervé would themselves resent it. Preachers sometimes tell us that if an ungodly man, by some mistake, were admitted into heaven, he would be the first to demand permission to go to 'his own place.' In like manner, we fancy, opéra-bouffe among works of art, and M. Hervé among the masters of music, would both feel excessively uncomfortable. However, there is no help for our mixing up of things that differ, and, without further preface, we turn to Chilpéric.

"As Chilpéric was written and composed by M. Hervé, and Chilpéric, on the stage, is M. Hervé himself, the question first arises—Who is M. Hervé? Various replies are forthcoming. We are told, as a matter of course, that he was originally destined for the church. If any man makes himself famous one-a-days as a writer of very secular music, somebody is sure to find out that, in his youth, he entertained sacred aspirations. The love of romance prompts this, it may be; but, at any rate, the composer has no reason to grumble. He becomes an interesting object to the people who are attracted by startling contrasts in life; in the people, for example, who lionise Monsieur the Abbé Liszt. Further, we have been informed that M. Hervé was once a pupil of Cherubini. Here, however, M. Hervé himself steps in—somewhat unnecessarily, we must confess—and says that, as he is only thirty-five years old, he could not well have been, and, in point of fact, never was, taught by the illustrious Italian. After all, what matters about antecedents? We have him among us, and sufficient unto the day is M. Hervé. The position occupied by the French composer must be perfectly well understood. He is, perhaps, the most successful of the many writers who are emulating the good fortune of M. Offenbach. His later pieces have invariably hit the taste of the Offenbach period, and there is every reason to believe that he will run his prototype very hard. There is a difference, however, between the two. M. Offenbach accepted his rôle as the musician of buffoonery. He never puts on a grandiose air, as who should say:—'I stoop to opéra bouffe, but If I rose to my full height you would see Offenbach's head among the stars.' Let us do the man this justice. Knowing his strength—and he has strength in his way—and, perhaps, feeling his limits, he is satisfied to type that Mille. Schneider may dance. The merit is a great one, and a rare; so that we fervently hope M. Offenbach may never lose it. M. Hervé, on the other hand, appears to be a little ambitious. There are passages in his Chilpéric, and other works, which show a strong leaning towards seriousness. May fate avert the dreaded issue. We all know the 'serious man' of common life, whose mission it is to go about with a wet blanket and damp everybody's enjoyment. M. Hervé, in serious mood, makes us all melancholy. Witnessing Chilpéric, for example, we laugh now and then, and grow sad the while—we did when the late Mr. Robson played upon our feelings with cunning hand. But the Hervé sadness is not the sadness of sympathy. We do not feel with but for him who has excited it.

"About the music we have not much to say beyond the remarks already made. When it aims at nothing more than accompanying the fast and furious fun of the stage, it is well enough for its purpose; being rhythmical, lively, and varied. It must be conceded, ah-o, that many of the sentimental passages are pretty. But when M. Hervé approaches the 'grand,' his position resembles, to use a reasonable illustration, that of a skater who has passed the danger boards. If the lively Frenchman will be content to imitate his compatriot, and keep within proper limits, he may safely reckon upon admiration of a certain kind. Otherwise, he is as sure to come to grief."

WOLFL AND STERNDALE BENNETT.

In the Pall Mall Gazette of last Monday appeared the following:—

"At the last concert but one were played—besides the third Rasumowski quartet, and Mozart's clarionet quintet—two novelties which deserve more than ordinary attention. The first reminded Mr. Chappell's audience of a composer for the pianoforte called Joseph Woelfl. Need existed for the reminder, so rarely are the works of this musician performed. We, of the present generation, must admit against ourselves that Woelfl has been hardly treated. He was no ordinary genius. In his youth, brought very near the great masters, being a pupil both of Mozart's father and Haydn's brother, he continued very near them in other respects at his life. Like Dussek and Clementi—he stood high among the bis minores of music, though, as the result has shown, not high enough for the appreciation he deserved. The life of Woelfl, so much as is known of it, is not one pleasant to dwell upon. A brilliant beginning, followed by a melancholy end, the story is only too common where genius is the subject. But if the life of the man may be forgotten, the merit of his works should not be overlooked, and the production on Monday week of the grand sonata in C minor (Op. 25) was a timely event. The sonata has abundant merit. Its very form, three movements of the ordinary character being preceded by an introduction and fugue, at once challenges attention, which is amply repaid as soon as Woelfl's great contrapuntal skill becomes manifest. There is no 'leanness' about his fugues; neither any lack of scientific device, nor of sustained vigour. The last-named quality is equally conspicuous in the first movement of the sonata proper, though here controlled by graceful fancy instead of scholastic rule. In the adagio, Woelfl deals with but one theme, and tides over his self-made difficulty with consummate skill. No movement, however, is more interesting than the finale which contains as much genuine melody, combined with masterly development, as could be found in any work of its class. To sum up, the sonata is a great thing. It was played by Madame Arabella Goddard, who introduced it at her recitals last season, in a very successful manner, many and formidable difficulties seeming easiness itself to the artist's ever ready fingers. If anything, Madame Goddard's rendering of the fugue was most noteworthy, because rarely is a fugue given with such clearness and unfailing accuracy. The second novelty was a sonata in A major for piano and violoncello by Dr. Sternedale Bennett. Our English composers seldom does not often appear in the Monday Popular programme, and his beautiful work must have been to many a revelation of Dr. Bennett's skill in chamber music. May it not, also, have excited wonder that the turn of the sonata had come so late? But this is no more than the ordinary treatment Dr. Bennett receives. His has written music of all kinds, much of it masterly, none deserving neglect; yet he is overlooked to an extent altogether inexcusable. If we treat our foremost composer thus, who shall say that we are worthy of a higher musical position than that we hold? The sonata in four movements, all marked by the graceful ideas and elegant expression so characteristic of the composer. It is hard to tell which deserves most praise, and not less to decide, whether the beauty of the work, or the happy style in which it is written for the two instruments, is more remarkable. Madame Arabella Goddard and Signor Piatti were worthily associated in its performance, and, we hardly need say, gave entire satisfaction. Mr. Santley obtained an encore for Piatti's 'Swallow, swallow, flying south.'

HERR JOACHIM.

The appearance of this distinguished artist on Saturday last, was noticed by the Pall Mall Gazette as follows:—

"The Saturday Popular Concerts, given from time to time in St. James's Hall, are, as everybody knows, an outgrowth from Mr. Chappell's main scheme. At one of these, which took place on Saturday last, Herr Joseph Joachim made his first appearance for the season. A large audience gave him a hearty, we had almost said an affectionate, greeting. The latter term is scarcely stronger than the facts justify. By means sufficiently obvious, Herr Joachim has made each of his audience not only an admirer, but a friend. The great qualities which constitute him Serie primus among his fellows must, in any case, excite admiration; but with these are combined such devotion to art, and such suppression of self, that it is impossible not to regard him with a warmer feeling. Herr Joachim has been called the Bayard of music; and assuredly in respect to the cause he serves he is sans reproche. With the coming of this great violinist the Monday Popular season reaches its climax. His appearance is an event, which, in the estimation of St. James's Hall amateurs, all foregoing events have simply preluded; and, the greeting over, there is a general settling down to a long-anticipated treat. Saturday's audience had no cause to complain that the 'good wine' of the season's feast was kept back, the first piece being Beethoven's C major quintet (Op. 29). Herr Joachim's playing in this beautiful work must be well remembered, even by those who have heard it only once. Not to mention his expressive reading of the adagio, who is likely to forget the lovely episode which twice arrests the impetuous course of the finale? In those few bars Herr Joachim's violin sings—there is no better word—with a pathos nothing short of marvellous. All the accustomed effect was produced on Saturday; and indeed the entire work was admirably played."

MOSCOW.—The Sisters Marchisio made their last appearance, for the season, at the Italian Opera, in Lucrezia Borgia. They were much applauded, and received all sorts of presents, of gold or silver and the like, as the case might be, not to mention the usual offerings of flowers, which were equally elegant, and, in the depth of a Russian winter, equally expensive, though not, perhaps, possessing the same positive value in the eyes of the fair recipients.

MILAN.—The following are the sums which will be received by the leading artists engaged this season at the Scala:—Madame Sass, 38,000 francs in gold; Madame Blume, 18,000 francs; Madame Frederici, 7,5000 francs; Signor Villani, tenor, 27,000 francs, in addition to the sum of 6,000 francs, paid to the manager of the Teatro Fenice, Venice, for consenting to free him from the engagement he had signed to sing at that place of amusement; Signor Zaccometti, 17,000 francs; Signor Ignio Corsi, 4,500 francs; Signor Storti, 8,000 francs; Signor Medini, 7,500 (up to the 25th inst.); Mdlle. Prina, première danseuse, 9,000 francs; Signor Massagno, dancer, 6,000 francs, and Herr Paul Taglioni, for his ballet, Don Parasol, which proved an utter failure, 4,000 francs.

LONDON BALLAD CONCERTS.

The fourth and last concert of the series took place in St. James's Hall, on Wednesday week, and drew together a crowded audience. On this occasion, Mr. Sims Reeves appeared and sang three songs in his usual unapproachable style. Mr. Reeves's first selection was Mr. Hatton's "Plinbe dearest;" his second, Sullivan's "The snow lies white;" and his last, Balfe's "Come into the garden, Maud." Encores were demanded for all three, as a matter of course, and demanded in a more peremptory tone than usual, because the singer appeared better able, in a physical sense, to comply. Madame Sherrington, Mdlle. Lichhart, Madame Patey, Miss Julia Elton, and Miss Jewell were the ladies engaged. Each sang some more or less favourite ditties, and obtained a share in the very liberal applause. Mr. Lewis Thomas gave two of his best songs; and Mr. Boscovitz varied the proceedings with some light pianoforte pieces. The Orpheus Glee Union contributed several glees and part-songs.

Mr. Boosey announces a second series of these popular entertainments to commence Feb. 11th, and to be continued every Saturday evening till further notice.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

It has been usual to terminate the performances of pantomime at the end of January, but the daily attendance of large numbers of visitors to witness Whittington and his Cat this year has led to its continuance for another fortnight. The spirit infused into the pantomime by the principal performers, and the homely application to the matter of its story, have invested it with a much higher degree of interest than is usual with these ephemeral productions. On Tuesday the 8th February, besides the pantomime and the graceful performances of the American skaters, Messrs. Moe and Goodrich, the annual show of the National Peristeronic Society will be held in the Tropical Department. From the high-sounding title of this amateur association few people probably understand that its objects are to improve the breed of pigeons, and by holding these annual exhibitions, to enable pigeon keepers to improve their collections. Only those who have been present at the society's shows can have any conception of the interesting character of the exhibition of these beautiful pet birds. They are shown in handsome mahogany cages, and some of the pairs are valued at almost fabulous prices. The show never remains open beyond one day. It will open at mid-day and close at dusk.

NATIONAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

At this society's concert in Exeter Hall, on Wednesday week, was performed besides the Walpurgis Night and Hymn of Praise, a Psalm by Moses Mosely, written by Mendelssohn for use in a convent. The composer himself has told the story of his first connection with this institution, and we cannot do better than reproduce his words. In a letter to his sister, Fanny, dated Rome, December 30, 1830, he said:—"When in the Ave Maria sounds, it is time to go to the church of Trinità de' Monti, where the French nuns sing, and it is charming to hear them. I declare to heaven that I am becoming quite tolerant, and listen to bad music with edification; but what can I do? The composition is positively ridiculous; the organ plays a most infernal accompaniment. But it is twilight, and the whole of the gaudy little church is filled with persons kneeling, lit up by the sinking sun each time the door is opened. Both the singing nuns have the sweetest voices in the world, quite tender and touching, more especially when one of them sings the chants in her melodious voice, which we are accustomed to hear chanted by priests in a loud, harsh, monotonous tone. The impression is very singular, moreover, it is well known that no one is permitted to see the fair singers. I have, therefore, formed a strange resolution; I am composing something to suit their voices—which I observed very minutely, and I mean to send it to them—which I have various means of doing. That they will sing it I feel assured; and it will be pleasant for me to hear my chant performed by persons whom I never saw, especially as they must in turn sing it to the Barbaro Tedesco, whom they, also, never beheld. I am charmed with the idea. The text is in Latin—a prayer to Mary. Does not this notion please you?" Mendelssohn's poetical nature was doubtless worked upon by the romance of such an affair; and he seems to have cherished the idea suggested to him by the sweet voices of the Roman recluses. Mr. Martin did well to perform one of the convent works. The others ought to follow. Upon the performance, as much that of the better-known Walpurgis Night and Lobgesang, we need not dwell.

A WRITER in Le Ménestrel says, apropos of Chilpéric at the Lyceum, that, though the English observe Sunday with scrupulous care, and pass it "piously singing hymns," when midnight struck on Saturday week not a person budged, so great was the attraction of M. Hervé's music.

WHITHER?

GOOD Masters, here is the question of questions. We shall never cease to ask it, though we never get an answer. Does not the very absence of reply make us ask all the more earnestly? "Show us the future of things" was the prayer of humanity long before Saul visited the Witch of Endor, and it will be heard so long as any consciousness of the future remains. By patient study of signs and tokens we may dimly look a little way into the darkness before us; this, however, so far from satisfying, only stimulates our longing—Venitas vanitatum. But here is the consolation of St. Augustine. "If we had prescience of our prosperity, we should be careless; and understanding of our adversity, we should be senseless."

It is well, perhaps, that the Whither of music remains hidden, because, at all events, hope is left. According to Byron, "Hope tints to-morrow with prophetic ray;" and under its influence we may foresee the coming of men who shall be men of might enough to purge our art from the rubbish with which an age of decadence has encumbered it. We cling to this solitary means of comfort like the shipwrecked mariner to his floating bit of timber. If the Whither could be revealed we might lose it, and literally come to grief. All the signs of the times point to this result; for, that music is moving on in a dubious fashion needs no proof. What, for example, means all the talk we hear about "intellectuality?" Why do people everywhere gape with wonder at shallow muddiness, fancying it unfathomably deep? and why is there so much of turning from the symmetry of Beauty to adore formless Ugliness? This is no exaggeration, and close observers of things musical know it. The canons of art are threatened with revolution, and the active conspirators encounter but a passive resistance. Already there are people who have received their opinions ready-made from this new workshop of thought, and who go about with them in utter unconsciousness that they are rank heresy. These are the men and women who look upon Haydn with an air of complacent superiority, as they might the gambols of a pretty child. These, also, are the men and women who listen reverently to the latest effusion of unintelligibleness, as did Robert Irving to the "unknown tongues" Moreover, such people multiply, owing to the very character of their belief. Affecting to be wiser than their neighbours, they wrap their wisdom up in vagueness so that the folly of it is not readily discerned. To the large class represented, say, by the individuals who purchase German diplomas, such a thing is always dangerously attractive.

Although we may properly use ridicule against Wagner and the other chiefs of the new movement, it will not do simply to laugh at them. There is no greater mistake than that of underrating your foe. These men are dangerous, and the longer resistance to them is merely passive, the more formidable they become. We would urge every true lover of the art which Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, and Mendelssohn adorned, to by up and doing against its deadly enemies. Of course, a certain degree of obloquy will follow. The modern Germans, and their English co-believers, have the advantage of position. They can hold themselves out as the champions of progress, and the opponents of finality; they can point to the onward course of all things, and ask, with becoming indignation, whether music alone shall stand still. This may affect ignorant outsiders, but not those who know that all progress is not improvement.

"To follow you I'm not content.
Unless I know which way you went" was the reply of a wag to a defunct preacher, preaching through his mortuary marble. A like caution should be exercised as to the progress of modern music. Let none of us be carried away by high-sounding phrases; but, rather, let us use the common sense and sound judgment with which we may happen to be endowed. An impartial comparison of true art with the wretched pinchbeck which too often passes current now-a-days, will confirm us in the right. Our fear is that this will not always be made. "Weak brethren" will think it a fine thing to belong to the advance guard of music; to have "Progress" for their watch-word, and to affect enjoyment of that which, to most others, is incomprehensible. Warn the "weak brethren," and, pointing, ask them "Whither?"

THE great event since our last has been the reappearance among us of Herr Joseph Joachim. He played at the Saturday Popular Concert of January 29, and at the Monday Popular Concert (one and the same thing, be it understood) of January 31. What he played will be duly recorded in our next—besides what he shall have played between this and then. As to how he played, we may as well state at once, and without preamble, that he played as no violinist we remember ever played before, and as no violinist (except himself) is, in our time, likely again. Add to this, that his welcome was one of the most hearty and enthusiastic in our experience, and we have said enough for the present. And, after all, eight days hence, what is there to write about this wonderful artist which has not been written again and again? Talk of people being tired of calling Aristides "the just"!—how much more tired must people be (supposing it possible to tire of speaking about such a man) of calling Joseph Joachim the greatest of the race of artists who, from Corelli to our own day—forgetting neither Paganini, Spohr, nor Ernst—have made the fiddle the instrument of their choice! Nevertheless, such is the magnetic attraction that people must, perforce, go on asserting it till Herr Joachim, fatigued alike with labour and eulogy, abandons both, for a life of undisturbed tranquility. Then will the time for him to compose music that may be played with legitimate effect, by performers less exceptionally gifted than himself. We are greatly mistaken if Herr Joachim be not something more than an unequalled interpreter of the thoughts of others.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

MADAME PUZZI's second soirée musicale took place on Thursday week, at 24, Belgrave Square, and was largely, as well as fashionably, attended. The artists who appeared were Mesdames Lancia, Fairman, and Pyne, Messrs. Trelawney Cobham, Ciabatta, Foli, Paque, de Kontski, and John Thomas. As all the selections are more or less familiar, there is no need to dwell upon what was done. Enough that the audience were, with good reason, entirely satisfied. Messrs. Gans and Mori acted as accompanists.

THE MAY-FAIR CHORAL SOCIETY gave a concert, on the 28th ult, at the CURZON Street School-rooms, May-Fair, at which a selection from Rossini's Stabat Mater, Hadyn's Creation, Mr. John Thomas's Bride of Neath Valley, and the late Mr. Weis's Foresters' Roundelay (which last, many think, deserves to be better known). The choruses were, for the most part, well sung; and the solos were creditably given by the Misses Harrison and Hughes; Messrs. Coen, Donse, and Charles James Blakenden (the new bass vocalist); Messrs. Gaskin, Williams, and Stokes were, respectively, accompanists and conductor. The attendance was good, and the applause genuine and hearty.

MR. AND MRS. RICHARD BLAGROVE gave the first of a series of six concerts on Thursday evening, the 27th ult., which attracted a full audience. Mr. R. Blagrove, one of the best concertina players, took part in an MS. trio in G major, Op. 68, with his wife (late Miss Freeth), a clever pianist, and Mr. Doyle, tenor, which was received with favour. Mr. Blagrove also played a fantasia, by Alard, upon airs from Maria Tudilla; a Duo Concertante, with Mrs. R. Blagrove on Welsh airs, arranged by himself; and Chopin's Polonaise for baritone concertina and pianoforte, all of which were thoroughly well executed and much applauded. Mrs. R. Blagrove gave Mendelssohn's Andante and Rondo Capriccioso with admirable spirit. Mr. John Thomas played his own harp solo, "Pensive and Joyous," to the evident satisfaction of all present. Miss Katherine Poyntz, in Guglielmi's "Gratias Agimus," and "Hagar," a new and effective song by Mr. Joseph Duggan (first time), created a legitimate effect. She also, with Mrs. Osborne Williams, gave Mr. F. Berger's duet, "Blossoming Time." The same lady and Signor Caravoglia contributed some other vocal pieces. Mr. Osborne Williams presided at the pianoforte.

MR. CHAPLIN HENRY gave a concert in the Store Street Rooms on Wednesday evening, and was well supported, notwithstanding the weather. A number of well-known vocalists assisted him, and evidently pleased his audience, who were liberal with applause, and disposed to have as many things twice as long as artists are inclined to give. Mr. Chaplin Henry, besides lending the aid of his telling voice to his comrades of the Orpheus Glee Union, contributed two solos—a new setting, by Mr. Simpson, of "Cease, rude Boreas," and Mr. J. W. Elliott's "Song of Hybrias the Cretan," both of which were warmly applauded. Among other pieces, more or less admired, were Mr. Ganz's "Faithful Echo" (Miss Banks—recalled); Madame Saiuton-Dolby's "Bridal Song" (Mr. Byron—encored); Nicolai's duet, "One Word" (made popular by Signor and Madame Trebelli), sung by Miss Julia Elton and Mr. Byron; Mr. Ganz's "Since Yesterday" (Miss Fanny Holland—encored); Mr. Berger's "Come and meet me, darling" (Mr. Charles Stanton); Signor Randegger's serenade, "Sleep, dearest, sleep" (Miss Julia Elton—violoncello obbligato, Mr. Edward Howell); and Mr. Edward Land's Valse Cavatina, "La Gitana" (Miss Banks). The Orpheus Glee Union were forced to repeat Mr. Hatton's "When Evening's Twilight," and a comic part-song, "The Three Chafers," Evening's Twilight," and a comic part-song, "The Three Chafers," which is considerably humour. Two instrumental pieces were well played and well received. These were Mendelssohn's Aria con variazioni, for violoncello and piano, by Mr. E. Howell and Mr. Willing; and a violoncello solo, by the first-named gentleman. The concert was well attended.—On the following evening, the fourth of Mr. Ridley Prentice's chamber concerts took place, and this, also, drew together a full audience. The instrumental works then presented were Beethoven's string quartet in D (No. 3), Mr Cipriani Potter's duet in F, for two pianofortes, Chopin's "Fantasia-Impromptu," in C sharp minor, and Beethoven's violin and pianoforte sonata in G (Op. 30, No. 3). With the entrepreneur were associated Mr. Walter Macfarren, Messrs. Henry and Richard Blagrove, Mr. J. Ralph, and Mr. W. H. Aylward. The performance, from beginning to end, was as irreproachable as the selection of subjects, and evidently keenly relished by the large company present. The impromptu of Chopin was redemanded of Mr. Prentice, who, however, substituted for it another short piece. The vocalists were Miss Annie Edmonds and Mr. Mary Vinning. The latter accepted an encore for his spirited rendering of Benedict's "Rage, thou angry storm," and the lady declined a similar compliment, elicited by her expressive singing of Sullivan's "O fair dove! O fond dove!" Mr. Walter Macfarren accompanied the vocal music.—W.H.P.

PRAGUE.—The members of the celebrated Florentine Quartet were the objects of a murderous and cowardly attempt on their lives, during their way from Gimütz to this city. As they were passing Pardubitz, the window of the railway carriage occupied by them was shattered by a bullet, which lodged in the case containing the famous Straduarius, on which Herr Jean Becker always plays. Luckily, the valuable instrument was not damaged. Herr Becker, on the contrary, was somewhat seriously injured by the fragments of glass which were scattered about in all directions. The motive and the perpetrator of this dastardly outrage are unknown, but the police are actively employed in trying to discover at least the perpetrator.

PROVINCIAL.

DUBLIN.—A writer in Freeman's Journal, of January 14th, says:—

"There were two concerts yesterday in the Antient Concert Hall. The first concert was given in the most perfect manner by the Messrs. Shakespeare, Nicholson, Crosier, Harper, Liddell, Elsner, and Hughes. A flute solo by Mr. Nicholson was listened to with an interest demanded by the merit of the artist. The Messrs. Lazarus, Levey, Liddell, Gunn, and Elsner played most unexceptionably a largbetto, minuet, and trio from Mozart's clarionet quintet. Nothing could have been finer, more accurate, more instructive, more delightful. Beethoven's grand quintet (pianoforte, oboe, clarionet, horn, and bassoon) was given with charming precision. A duet (pianoforte and clarionet) by Weber, was played by Messrs. Shakespeare and Lazarus, and warmly applauded; and a grand finale closed an entertainment in every respect a delight."

A writer in the Irish Times (23rd ult.) says:—

"A most interesting concert was given last night in the Rotundo, by the inmates of St. Mary's Asylum for Female Blind. The hall was thronged. The scene presented was a novel one. In front, a blind girl was placed who accompanied the singing on the harp, and near her sat another at the piano, while the remainder, clad in neat brown frocks, were ranged along the benches at the back. This conductor, who is also a blind girl, had an exceedingly arduous task, but she overcame the difficulties of her situation with remarkable tact. Only one person possessing sight occupied a place upon the platform, and it was her duty to bring forward each singer, and remove her to her seat when she had concluded. The spirit with which the poor girls entered into their performances, and the flush of delight which passed over their sightless faces when the loud applause sounded through the hall, were very pleasant to observe. Some of those who sang the solos were mere children, but even they manifested an intelligence and individualism quite extraordinary. The vocalism was throughout excellent. Some Irish airs on the harp and the piano were given with ability and effect. The accompaniments, although played 'by ear,' were praiseworthy."

A Dublin correspondent writes:—

"The second concert of the Philharmonic Society came off last evening; and certainly, if a goodly number of first-rate artists could ensure the prestige of a musical entertainment, it deserved success. This must be said of the Philharmonic Society; that its directors spare no expense in procuring for its concerts the most celebrated European artists. Thus, Dublin is not left behind London in musical information; and, were the orchestral works more appreciated and encouraged by our concert-goers, we are sure the band would be augmented by skilled hands, and we should not be behind other places in instrumental resources. However, it is much to say that the orchestral pieces on last evening, were not only given with perfect precision, but were fairly delightful. Would that we could add that their merits were recognized by those present. But we cannot. The vocalists were Mr. Mapleson's touring party—Tietjens, Vanzini, Scalchi, Stockhausen, Della Rocca, Tagliafico, with Signor Bevignani as accompanist."

LEEDS.—The Yorkshire Post speaks thus of a concert given in the Town Hall, on the 13th inst.:—

"The first part consisted almost entirely of Dr. Sternbale Bennett's Woman of Samaria, performed for the first time in Leeds. It was favourably received. Mdlle. Doria in 'Art thou greater than our father Jacob?' was somewhat cold, but in 'Jerusalem' (St. Paul), she succeeded in enlisting the sympathies of the audience. Her singing was marked by tenderness and feeling. Mrs. Lemmens-Sherrington's voice is suited to the expression of pathetic compositions, and this was pleasingly exemplified in 'O Lord, Thou hast searched me out.' Mr. Perren's 'Sound an Alarm' has seldom been sung better, although we have heard him in better voice. The chorus and part-songs were very well sung."

GUILDFORD.—We abridge the following from the Surrey Advertiser, of Jan. 22nd:—

"The committee of the Guildford Institute afforded the members and the public a treat on Thursday, when Mrs. John Macfarren gave a pianoforte and vocal recital, the programme containing such pieces as Weber's 'Moto Continuo;' 'Songs without Words,' Mendelssohn; Aria, 'Voi che Sapete,' Mozart; New Scotch Fantasia, 'Scotia,' Bolesse; 'Sonata Pathetique,' Beethoven; Caprice, 'The Butterfly,' and Grand Fantasia, L'Elisir d'Amore, Thalberg. Mrs. Macfarren was warmly applauded, and compelled with several encores. She was ably assisted by Miss Jessie Royd, who sang with great effect, 'Late, so late' (Idylls of the King), by G. A. Macfarren, in which she was encored, as well as in the ballad, 'Within a mile of Edinburgh town;' in the latter case she gave 'Thady O'Flynn,' rendered with spirit and vivacity."

ST. ANDREWS.—Selections from Mendelssohn's St. Paul were performed on the 21st, accompanied by the Drechsler-Hamilton family; airs by Mesdames Mitchell, Farnie, Lowe, Brown, and Ferguson, Messrs. Balfour and Macgill. Conductor, Mr. Salter.

EDINBURGH.—We read as follows in the Scotsman of January 28th:—

"Professor Oakeley delivered yesterday afternoon, in the Music Class-room, the third of his lectures on Mediæval music, the subject on this occasion being the music of Northern Europe. He characterized harmony as the distinctive property of the north, as melody is of the south of Europe. The earliest mention of harmony, he said, occurs shortly after the irruption of the tribes from the north; and instruments of a polyphonous or symphonic kind, as the Russian gousli and the Celtic crwth came from this direction. Vocal harmony was known to the German and Sclavonic races from early ages. While the southerners were analyzing harmony and devising laws of counterpoint, the peasantry of the north were soloing their hard-ships with part-singing, derived from no artificial source, but prompted by love of musical concord. Allusion was made to the service done to music by Charlemagne, to Bede, Maurus, and Albertus Magnus, as writers of music, and to Hucbald, who did more service to music than poetry."

GLASGOW.—A Glasgow paper contains the following:—

"Mr. Kennedy, the celebrated Scottish vocalist, has appeared at the Saturday City Hall Concerts, and was most enthusiastically received by one of the largest audiences ever congregated at these admirably conducted weekly entertainments. The entertainment was supported by Mr. Kennedy and Miss Bessie Aitken, Miss Kennedy acting as accompanist. Mr. Kennedy was in excellent voice, and his songs, carefully selected from the productions of our best national lyrists, were loudly and deservedly applauded. Altogether the concert was a decided success. Mr. Lambeth presided with his usual ability at the organ.—Another of Mr. Peace's extremely interesting organ recitals, with which the brilliant and accomplished organist of Trinity Church is in the habit of gratifying his listeners during the winter months, has taken place in presence of a select but appreciative audience."

BISHOP'S STORTFORD.—A correspondent writes us about a concert given at this place:—

"A more delighted and appreciative audience it would, perhaps, be difficult to find. The instrumental music was excellent. Haydn's Symphony, No. 5, especially, being capitally rendered. Of Miss Amy Perry's pianoforte playing we cannot speak too highly. Her skilful execution of the difficult passages of Thalberg's 'Home, sweet Home,' and Holmes' 'Scotch Caprice,' showed she possessed a command over the pianoforte only to be obtained by constant practice combined with natural ability. The vocal music given was evidently to the taste of the audience, who redemanded many of the pieces with acclamation, and so prolonged the concert to a late hour."

LIVERPOOL.—In the Liverpool Mercury, of the 3d inst., we read as below:—

"The second subscription concert of the Philharmonic Society was remarkable for the introduction of a new 'fairy tale' overture, Aladdin, written by a young Dane named Horneman. The work has never before been performed in England, and more than usual care had been bestowed upon its rehearsal. The first of Haydn's twelve symphonies (in C) opened the concert, and was played with a true appreciation of the spirit of the work. The vocalists were Madame Sinico, Miss Annie Edmonds, and Mr. Santley. The first-named, gave as her solos 'Ernani! involami,' and Harry Smart's pretty song, 'The birds were telling one another,' both sung with refinement and spirit. 'Bid me discourse,' was Miss Edmonds' only solo, and this she rendered in an unpretentious yet effective manner. 'The Wreck of the Hesperus' received from Mr. Santley a highly dramatic and expressive reading. Arditi's 'Stirrup Cup' being given for the encore; an air from Mozart's Figaro, and a canzonet and an air by Scarlatti were his other solos, both sung in his invariably earnest and masterly style. Madame Arabella Goddard was the solo pianist, selecting for her performance Sternbale Bennett's Caprice in E major and Beethoven's fantasia on Fraeschütz. The latter was played with rare brilliancy, breadth, and grace, and the former could scarcely have received a more refined execution. The reappearance of Herr Wilhelmj was welcome. His wonderful capabilities were especially shown in his playing of Ernst's fantasia on Otello, which he played in a remarkably brilliant style, and well deserved the applause which he obtain-d. His lesser solo—an andante by Bach—was played with almost vocal intensity. Only two numbers were given by the practical members—the fairy chorus from Oberon and a three hundred-year-old madrigal called 'Lady, see on every side'—both of which were sung with excellent expression. Mr. Benedict, as conductor and accompanist, did good service as usual. The audience were very large and extremely talkative in some parts of the hall, showing that gossip rather than music was their chief delight. Those who indulge in whispered conversations should remember there are people who go to concerts for the purpose of hearing the music. Israel in Egypt is in rehearsal for the next concert."

SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS

(From the "Times.")

The Saturday Evening Concerts now being held weekly, at Exeter Hall, under the direction of Mr. George Wood, seem likely to supply a want. They are excellent of their kind, and the four already given may be accepted as warrants of much that is good to come. Orchestral and vocal concerts for the million, at reasonable prices of admission, are much to be desired. Such entertainments, under such conditions, Mr. Wood has projected, and is to all appearances carrying out with success. His orchestra is thoroughly efficient, the principals (leading violin, Mr. H. Weist Hill) being, without exception, practised performers; and, when it is added that the sole vocalists are of the highest eminence, and the solo instrumentalists, for the most part, to match, it may be easily imagined that the Saturday Evening Concerts present more than ordinary attractions to amateurs. Nor can these attractions be in any degree lessened by the fact that Mr. Henry Leslie is conductor.

At each of the four concerts an orchestral symphony has been a prominent feature. The symphony in G which the great Haydn wrote for Oxford; Beethoven's No. 2, scarcely approached by any other composer's No. 9; and those genuine masterpieces, the symphonies in G minor and C major (the so-called "Jupiter" of Mozart), have all been played, and well played. Then we had at the opening concert a very artistic and brilliant performance by Miss Agnes Zimmermann of Mendelssohn's second and most trying pianoforte concerto in D; and last, not least, Weber's overture to Oberon. At the second concert the overtures were the same composer's to Der Freischütz, and Otto Nicolai's lively prelude to his opera, The Merry Wives of Windsor, one of the memorable productions at the late Her Majesty's Theatre; at the third we had the "Procession March" of Mr. Arthur S. Sullivan, and Auber's overture to Masaniello; at the fourth (on Saturday evening) Rossini's Semiramide and Auber's Zanetta. Thus the orchestra has assumed a fairly important position—something more than that of an indispensable aid to the vocal selections.

But, in addition to this, the director of the Saturday Evening Concerts has shown enterprise in another way, by engaging the services of instrumental solo performers of distinguished ability. We have already named the well-known pianist, Miss Agnes Zimmermann, who, at the first concert, proved herself no intimately conversant with Mendelssohn; we have now to speak of Herr Wilhelmj, the Swedish violinist, who, at the Monday Popular Concerts and elsewhere, some three or four years ago, preferred a just claim to be regarded as one of the most expert and accomplished masters of the violin now existing. This gentleman made his début at the second concert, and brought the place he had chosen—a concerto (or rather a concertino), by Herr Ferdinand David, of Leipsic—was remarkable for nothing in particular beyond the mechanical difficulties with which it is crowded, it afforded ample opportunities for exhibiting his unlimited command of the instrument. Without entering into technical details, which would be uninteresting to our readers, we may say, in a word, that Herr Wilhelmj plays with difficulties as if they were no difficulties at all; that his tone is large and rich, and his intonation faultless. So admirable was his performance that in spite of the elaborate dulness of the concerto he was enthusiastically applauded and recalled. In the plaintive Elegie of the late regretted Ernst, although Herr Wilhelmj pleased unless, he seemed to please the audience even more, inasmuch as they unanimously compelled him to repeat it. On his second appearance, he gave the same composer's fantasia on airs from Rossini's Otello, including the march, the "Willow Song" of Desdemona, &c. This taxes the manual dexterity of a violinist perhaps more severely than any other similar piece; but difficulties vanish before Herr Wilhelmj; and it was only in the touching and pathetic melody with which, in Rossini's opera, Desdemona beguiles her solitude that we were reminded of something being wanted to impart the fullest expression to one of the most musical of all dramatic pieces, and that the something in question could hardly, with strict justice, be reckoned among the gifts vouchsafed to Herr Wilhelmj. It was with the "Willow Song," as it had been with the Elegie—the tone and intonation were perfect, while the expression, though studied, was comparatively tame and passionless. In the second part of the programme, at the same concert, Herr Wilhelmj introduced a movement from an orchestral suite in D, by John Sebastian Bach, which John Sebastian Bach himself would have been somewhat surprised to hear thus metamorphosed. In the first place, the key of the movement was transposed a tone, and, in the next, the whole was played an octave lower; so that, although accompanied by string instruments, the effect of the andante was by no means what the author intended. Whether it is permissible to take such liberties with the works of great masters, we leave to the consideration of those who interest themselves in these matters and are competent to judge. This arrangement, or disarrangement, of Bach, although it was better played, did not make the same effect upon the audience as the Elegie of Ernst.

The vocal department at the Saturday Evening Concerts has been powerfully represented, with Madame Sinico, Signor Foli, Mr. Santley, and Mr. Sims Reeves among the leading singers. Madame Sinico pleased generally, but perhaps in nothing so much as in a new and charming song by Mr. Henry Smart, "The birds are telling one another," which created so marked an impression at the first concert that she was obliged to reproduce it at the third. Signor Foli is very deservedly a favourite with London amateurs; and we wish he would bring forward more of such healthy inspirations as the late E. J. Loder's song, "The Diver" (which he sings with genial vigour), and eschew some others that might be named. Mr. Santley, at the first concert, obtained his accustomed encore for "O ruddier than the cherry," which no one in our remembrance has ever sung so splendidly, and at the third introduced a new and pleasing ballad by Miss Virginia Gabriel ("Cleansing Fires"). Mr. Sims Reeves, who was never singing better than now, has especially shone in his delivery of certain "English ditties," which will live as long as simply expressive melody allied to simply expressive words retains the power to charm the multitude. From among these we would single out Dibdin's "Tom Bowling," which, besides being a perfect thing in itself, afforded our greatest singer of Handel's music an occasion to prove himself equally our greatest singer of old English ballads. Another of the Exeter Hall concerts has contributed Beethoven's "Adelaida" (about which we need say nothing), Herr Blumenthal's still popular "Message," and (on two occasions) a new and effective song by Mr. Brinley Richards, entitled "Anita" (Garibaldi's Anita), accompanied by the composer on the pianoforte. We are glad to find Mr. Reeves still a resolute opponent to that objectionable system of "encores," which, when indulged in by audiences and acceded to by artists, goes far to spoil the best of musical entertainments, no matter what their character.

At the concert on Saturday night, besides the "Jupiter" symphony, the march from Mr. Benedict's Undine, the overtures of Rossini and Auber (already cursorily referred to), and the famous nautical song, the "Bay of Biscay," in which Mr. Sims Reeves invests the power to unmistakable enthusiasm, there were other attractions worth mentioning. Signor Foli was encored in two songs, "Fire-side Dreams" (Heyloff), and "The Cavalier's Steed" (Ascher), both of which he gave in his best manner; and a similar tax was imposed on Miss Helen D'Alton, after Mr. Macfarren's ballad, "The Gipsy's Home." In each instance the desire of the audience was complied with. Then there was novelty, in the shape of solos by Artôt and De Beriot, played by a youthful violinist from Italy, Signorina Virginia di Bonis, who possesses very considerable powers of execution, and an agreeable, though scarcely yet developed tone. Her first performance, at the end of which she was recalled, was perhaps the most successful. There is promise in this young lady which we hope to see fulfilled. Another pianist was Mr. Frederic Cowen, the recent public performance, in St. James's Hall, of whose remarkably clever symphony in C minor encouraged legitimate hopes that a new composer had sprung up among us. Mr. Cowen played with great spirit Mendelssohn's Capriccio Brillante in B minor (with orchestral accompaniments), and two solos from his own pen. The orchestra, as usual, was directed by Mr. Henry Leslie; and Mr. J. G. Callcott acted as accompanist at the pianoforte. This was the last concert of the originally projected series, but success has emboldened the director to announce a fresh series, which will commence on Saturday next.

LICENSE.—The report lately circulated, by certain papers, to the effect that Herr R. Wagner was dangerously ill, owed its origin, probably, to the principle, so liberally patronized by many people, of "making a mountain of a mole-hill." Herr R. Wagner has been, it is true, ill, but his illness could not have been very serious—not a tenth part so serious as his attempts at comic writing—seeing that it did not prevent him from giving the finishing touches to his Walkyrr, or, as others spell it, Walküre. There is a doubt, however, that Herr R. Wagner has received an official invitation to visit Berlin, when his opera of the Meistersinger is produced at the Royal Operahouse there; there is a regular league of aristocratic and influential ladies, who have made up their minds to see him in that capital. He makes it a sine qua non of his accepting the invitation that he shall conduct the first performance himself, and it is pretty certain he will have his way, "for," say the German papers, "the lady at the head of the said league can do whatever she likes."

BEETHOVENIANA.

(Communicated.)

1. I recently found in a musical report by one of our leading daily papers, alluding to the performance of Beethoven's Septet, a remark as to the different arrangements made by the composer himself of this masterpiece. I beg to contradict this statement, partly, which has been often erroneously propagated, by mentioning that the only arrangement by Beethoven himself of this work, is that in the form of a Trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello. All the other arrangements of the Septet which have been published as Quintet, Quartet, and a Duet, for Two Performers on the pianoforte, are by Czerny, Mockwitz, and others. I do not hesitate to express the opinion that Beethoven, with his great and creative genius, would not have devoted his time to such purposes.

2. It appears that Beethoven's Scotch Songs (with accompaniments for the pianoforte, violin, and violoncello) are nearly forgotten, or sadly neglected. Copies are very rare, nor do I ever remember to have heard them performed in public. Perhaps they may not be considered of so high a standing as other works of the great composer, he having written them to order for a publisher; but nobody will dispute that they are highly interesting, as in fact is every note this great master has composed, and a performance of them may prove the favourable impression they would create on our musical public. It would therefore be a great treat for the admirers of the genius of the immortal composer, and also for the musical public in general if the director of the Monday Popular Concerts were to give us a selection of them. I am convinced, beforehand, that the public would tender their gratitude for this novelty; and that the finished style in which all the masterpieces of our greatest composers are performed at those excellent chamber-concerts, would not fail to produce the best understanding of the above mentioned work by the sublime Beethoven.

January, 1870. DR. FERDINAND RAHLES.

BISHENDEN.

Apropos of a recent concert, the Hertford Standard makes some remarks which we print for the benefit of all and some; among the latter, Mr. Shirley Brooks, to whom we dedicate the reproduction as best able to appreciate it:—

"The song with which Mr. Bishenden chose to introduce himself was entitled 'The Friar of Orders Grey.' And in our opinion, he could not have hit upon a better piece of music in which to display his extraordinary vocal powers. A more deep-toned and mellow bass voice than his we have never heard, making allowances, of course, for his age. When the music is intended to arouse enthusiasm, he pours into it a fervour, a grandeur, and an expression, which is not his fault, if they do not effect all their purposes. Is it pathos that requires impersonation? His larynx, which has been one of his principal studies, is equal to the task of producing the most impassioned sounds. In truth Mr. Bishenden knows so well how to modulate his voice, that no piece of bass music, however difficult, comes amiss to him. In the hope that we shall be pardoned for digressing, we turn aside for a moment from Mr. Parsons's concert, and divert our attention to the question—to what does Mr. Bishenden owe his present popularity and great success? The question finds its solution in the enlargement of the word 'perseverance.' We are well aware how difficult it is to convince some capricious people that the majority of popular men owe their eminence and popularity, not so much to genius as to perseverance. Let the believers in genius have all they require in the shape of argument, and will they then have the audacity to controvert the fact that genius is a poor power when compared with perseverance. None admire the genius of Mr. Bishenden more than we do, but it would be a falsehood to deny that we admire his energy more. Could a young man of humble parentage, destitute of those advantages for acquiring knowledge with which a more fortunate one has endowed, write a book like The voice and how to use it, and sing a song like as Mr. Bishenden sang at the concert on Friday, solely by genius? We say no, and apprehend no sensible person would answer yes. Such a theory has, prima facie, so absurd an appearance, that it must crumble with the slightest touch. Assuming then that the vast powers ascribed to genius are fallacious, and that all arguments in support of its superiority over perseverance are sophisticated, we at once obtain the secret of Mr. Bishenden's success. Undauntedly, assiduously, and fidelity, with a single aim to become a good singer, this young gentleman has gradually worked himself up to the high position he now holds, both in the musical and literary world. It is with his progress in the former, however, that we are now most concerned. A brief sketch of his history appeared in our columns a few weeks since, and a recapitulation of any of the facts therein related is therefore unnecessary. His singing at Hemel Hempstead, on Friday, confirms us in the belief we have long felt, that none but the most apathetic audience could restrain their enthusiasm on hearing his majestic strains. Wherever he appears, whether in the presence of royalty, chivalry, or democracy; whether before the learned or illiterate, the erudite or the crude, connoisseurs or sycophants, no matter where, success is bound to attend him in all his efforts, and panegyric necessarily constitutes part of his reward. It may not be out of place, having given our own affirmative opinion of the singing of Mr. Bishenden, briefly to controvert some of the negative criticisms or calumnies, which since the concert have fallen under our notice. One gentleman critic has said that his singing was spoilt by his 'cheek.' Whether we take the expression in its literal or implied meaning, matters not. If the critic means that it is presumptuous or young a performer to sing with a great amount of confidence, we beg respectfully to differ with him. Nothing tends so much to success as confidence in one's own individual efforts, while, on the other hand, nothing impedes progress so much as diffidence in science or art, so much as an under-estimate of a person-ing application of one's own powers. It is this, we repeat, that has hitherto inspired Mr. Bishenden; but it does not thence follow that he is deserving of the epithet of 'cheeky.' Do those who think him so mean that he is not courteous enough to his audience? Neither does the term apply when viewed in this light: it is wholly inapplicable. It is no exaggeration to say that those who endeavour to pick a flaw in Mr. Bishenden's singing fail in their attempts, and that though they make a lot of criticisms they cannot but be frivolous and intangible. His merits are appreciated and commended by all who are versed in music, and satirical remarks proceed from none but the illiterate and the envious. Mr. Bishenden's talents are too sterling to be diminished in their worth by such as these. Such being the case, he is rendered invulnerable to all the darts of obloquy, and stands out with a most radiant brilliancy, which none of the fantastic lights of incompetent artists can in the least eclipse. Hemel Hempstead, among other glories, can boast of having produced a singer, whom all delight to hear, from the sovereign on the throne once occupied by Napoleon the Great, to the humblest peasant of the realm."

AUS WIEN.

(From our original Correspondent.)

I was just on the point of sending you an account of the beautiful new building of our Conservatoire as well as of the laing of the last stone by the Empereur on the 5th instant, the opening concert and the grand ball given by the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, the first on the 6th and the last one on the 15th of January; but a very sad accident has changed my happy news to melancholy ones.

On the evening of the 15th, after the last concert of Mme. Schumann was over, and everything in order, at nearly one o'clock a violent fire broke out in the garderobe on the ground floor, and until the fire-ingines arrived on the spot, the intensive smoke, more than the flames, destroyed the whole of the beautiful paintings, bas-relief, ornaments, and gildings of the grandious vestibule, the two magnificent staircases, the two small ones on the front side, as well as a suite of small rooms, and spoiled completely the walls and ceiling of the large concert-room, where the e frochi of Eisenmenger were so last admired. The door between the large and the small concert-room, being happily shut up, this last one was quite preserved from destruction. Another chance preserved also the splendid decorations and statues of the Loggia, joining to the large room. The damages are very great, but the premises will be opened again in a few days to concerts and balls, after undergoing some superficial reparations.

The Board of the Society have decided that the complete restauration of the building may take place when the season shall be over.

The origin of the fire is a great mistery, and all the investigations on the subject have delivered no plausible result whatever till to-day. The fact is that no gas flamme existed in the garderobe, where precisely the fire began.

The last concert of Mme. Schumann, although advertized by special desire, was poorly attended. Mme. Schumann was assisted for the vocal part by Mlle. Busse, who sang some Lieder of R. Schumann in a satisfactory manner. This Lady, of whom I spoke favorably in my last communication, be the occasion of her successful debut as Countess in the Nozze di Figaro at the Imperial Operahouse, has proved insufficient for other parts, as I anticipated, and therefore has been dismissed from the general Intendence. Au revoir.

Vienna, Jan. 23. SALVATORE SAVERIO DI BALDASSARE.

HANOVER SQUARE ROOMS.

Mrs. Lafontaine Erskine gave a reading, in the small room, on Jan 27th, her programme being varied by some violin and pianoforte solos, in which Signorina de Bono and Miss Julia Lafontaine appeared. Mrs. Erskine reads with great distinctness and considerable expression; qualities more or less manifest in all the selections presented. The principal extracts were from Longfellow ("Wreck of the Hesperus"); Thackeray ("Cane-bottomed Chair"); Shakspere ("Cleopatra"); Hood ("Number One"); and Jerrold ("Caudle's Lecture"). The entertainment went off successfully.

HAMBURGH.—After an interval of fifteen years, Herr R. Wagner's Lohengrin has been revived, with Herr Niemann in the principal character.

ORGAN GRINDING.

A person should never go into poetry, as Mr. Micawber went into coals, unless first sure not only of the divine afflatus, but also, so to speak, of the divine aura, a sort of sacred atmosphere which shall encircle him and make him impervious to all outward assaults of sound or sense until the fury passes and the verse is done.

I was never more aware of this than when, having been thoroughly ecstasized with the exquisite charm of a June dawn, I began to sing it to, what seemed to me, the heavenly measure beating in my brain, and to congratulate myself upon it as an opening to the fifth book of my great epic :—

> Now morning carried daylight to the gods,
> And, with the beaker carelessly aslant,
> Spilled half the golden ichor on the air;
> 'Twas set to rise on bitter barm;
> The jag was just as long's my arm;
> It wouldn't do a bit of harm
> To a captain in the army.

What? alas, then, what was this? Had my nimble pen been stolen from a plauchette? Had it taken the ink between its teeth, and essayed to write metallic nonsense of its own? Was my poetic gift and joy degraded into doggrel? Was this a spiritual manifestation? What was it that was working such a spell upon me? I knew a foreign influence in the neighbourhood "by the pricking of my thumb', even as the witches of Shakspere's time forefelt, and the witches of the "dark circles" of to-day do still detect evil approaches. I looked around me in a fine frenzy, and only then discovered with recognition the strains of the hand-organ whose piercing tones, from around the corner, had penetrated my dream till my impersonation of morning had become inextricably entangled with

> "Captain Jinks of the Horse Marines,
> Who fed his horse on corn and beans,
> Although 'twas quite beyond the means
> Of a captain in the army."

What nonsense it is to talk of the impossibility of projectiles turning a corner, when bare every note of the hand-organ had come round the corner to sting my ears like hornets! What was I to do? Give the organ-grinder money? Then, as one good turn deserves another, he would stay and play till doomsday, for all I knew. Shake a threatening hand at him? Then he would certainly stay. Call the police? They would laugh in my face, and though that might give me the satisfaction of taking legal damages arising from the non-completion of my epic, yet who but Apollo himself could assess those damages?

I let the dog out. To be sure, Spot would run from a hen; but then he could bark, and it would go hard if one noise could not drown out the other. It did. I returned to my epic. The beautiful sunrise was yet lovely in my experience, the warble of bird-song, the dew upon the branches, the breeze, the freshness, the perfume. I dwelt upon them in memory. I must transmute them all to my verse. A clean sheet of paper, and once more I began :—

> Now morning carried daylight to the gods,
> And, with the beaker carelessly aslant,
> Spilled half the golden ichor on the air
> At five o'clock in the morning.——

Oh, pshaw! Another organ. What could I do to be rid of the nuisance? Throw boots at him? Why not throw boots at him? You throw boots at the cats. Ah, patience, and—tear your hair. There is an old lady in the vicinity who never encourages the theatre or the circus, and would think ill of herself to lend a wistful countenance to any Italian screech-owl of a prima donna, she thanks heaven—but who trolls every organ-grinder in the country to her door. There he is now, the second one within the half-hour, turning, turning, like the wheel of fate, and the little girl in purple in the face with the tambourine, and the monkey carries round the hat for coppers—I detest a monkey! Allowing the Darwinian theory, why should a man have his low beginnings for ever thrust in his face? And there are the crowds of children, those gaping in open-mouthed delight, those exhibiting an ostentatious honesty in the matter of coppers—it humiliates me to remember that once I was a child myself! Let me panoply myself against the young rabble, and be as if they were not. Poor things! what do they know of epics? Another pen—I am in a diffe rent sphere—how then :—

> Now Morning carried daylight to the gods,
> And—said, I've just walked over,
> As I'd nothing else to do—

Good heavens! had I lost all control of myself? I sprang to my feet; the tune was just droning itself out; it would wait. An epic could wait, an epic must wait the convenience of the organ-grinder. At last stillness reigned once more. A bird lit on a bough, and gushed forth a trill of gladness through the hush. I glanced out; the corner was vacant; then let me make haste while it might, for organ-grinders are like musquitoes—when you have killed one, there is always another to coma buzzing and blowing his horn. Now I wipe my pen, and commence afresh on this immortal work which is to dazzle America and make Europe gnaw out her heart with envy. I hasten, I deaden myself to outside influences—for far, far away, already it seems to me I detect—perhaps it is not—it may be only the remnants of the last one singing in my ears—at any rate I will not borrow trouble:—

> Now Morning carried daylight to the gods,
> And, with the beaker carelessly aslant,
> Spilled half the golden ichor on the air,
> And drunk with radiance all the thirsty clouds
> Reeled—Champagne Charley is my name,
> Champagne Charley is my name,
> Always—

Could any one write an epic, I ask In all fairness, in a country where organ-grinding is not punishable with death? Look at this man—he is the compatriot of Dante—and yet he interferes with my epic! or is it national rivalry on his part, lest the Divina Commedia undergo eclipse? If I were ruler, should not the penalty for organ-grinding be banishment for the first offence, and death for all the others? He deserves no better. Plainly he stole the child who is screaming the songs out beside him, and, only the other day the Italian Parliament passed a law condemning him for it. And that is not the only thing he steals—for I know a family where the wife dotes on the hand-organ and the husband abominates it, and privately the wife pays money to the man for coming, and just as privately the husband pays money to have him go away, and between the two he fairly robs the family of half its income. May heaven confound all organ-grinders, say I! Let the evanescent essence of this June morning wait to be alchemised into golden verse when best it may. I will lay my epic on the shelf till organ-grinders and musquitoes, and bats and wasps and all the other pests of the summer season are things that were. Could Milton have written L'Allegro with an organ grinding the "Sabre of his Father" just at hand? L'Allegro! He would have flown to Il Penseroso. He would have cried from the lattice :—

> "Not for Joe, not for Joe,
> If he knows it not for Joseph,
> No, no, no, not for Joe,
> Not for Joseph, oh, dear no!"

JOHANN CHRISTIAN BACH.*

This Johann Christian Bach, "a composer who," as Gerber very naively remarks, "was unfaithful, it is true, to the Bach school, but, on that account, all the more pleasing and popular," played, first in Italy, at Milan, and then in London, where he resided from 1759 till his death, in 1782, a far more brilliant part in the world than his father, Johann Sebastian, whose youngest son he was. What position he held among his contemporaries we learn very fully from Dr. Burney.

When Christian left Berlin and arrived in Italy, his principal occupation was writing for the voice, and he assured Dr. Burney that, for many years, he never touched a piano except to compose for or accompany the voice. But, in consequence of his style of playing being so much admired in England, he endeavoured to recover his powers of execution, which he had lost for want of exercise, and also from the stiffness of his fingers, a stiffness produced by their being continually bent when holding a pen. He never, however, regained the rapidity necessary for the performance of very difficult passages. His pianoforte compositions were, also, such as could be easily mastered by ladies without too great an expenditure of trouble, and his Allegros more resembled brunura airs than instrumental pieces to be played by virtuosos. This is the reason of their losing so much if performed without the accompaniment of other instruments. The accompaniment is generally so masterly and interesting for the hearer as to conceal every insignificant passage in the pianoforte part.

In the operas he wrote for the London theatres, there are many exceedingly beautiful airs, for a long time very popular. Perhaps, however, it was more the richness of the accompaniments than anything extraordinary in the melody that procured for them this privilege, though the melody was always natural, pleasing, and treated in the best Italian taste. The Neapolitan school, in which he was brought up, appears unmistakably in his melodies, as the learning of his father, or rather, of his brother, appears in his harmony. His operas were the first from which the Da Capo, at that time universally the fashion, disappeared. The first part used to be combined with the second, to which the singer, after modulating in the fifth, generally returned.

Bach seems, also, to have been the first composer who regarded the value of contrast as a principle. Before his time, if any instance of contrast occurred n the works of other masters, it appeared to be merely the result of chance. Bach, on the contrary, in his Symphonies and other instrumental pieces, as well as in his vocal compositions, rarely omitted to work-in a long, soft passage after a rapid and noisy one.

At the present day, our worthy composers, for the purpose of producing a contrast, employ, after noisy passages for stringed instruments, whole choruses of flutes, oboes, clarionets, bassoons, horns, and trombones, which are, moreover, freshened up with trumpets and kettle-drums. In other words: these gentlemen substitute one species of noise for another! Who, at the present day, when every man's brain is always in a state of commotion, takes any pleasure in the quiet, gentle changes of Johann Christian Bach.

When our composer was first asked in London to write an Italian opera, he found himself in no small dilemma, on account of the badness of the singers for whom he was to write, and to whom he had to entrust his reputation. Luckily he heard De Amicis at a private party, and prevailed on the manager to engage her as prima donna for serious opera, she having previously sung in buffo opera only. He now, in 1763, composed his Orione, o sia Diana vendicata, which for three months excited general approbation. In addition to the beauties of melody and harmony for which it was distinguished, the entirely original manner in which he employed the wind instruments produced an especially profound impression. It was in this opera, also, that clarionets were heard for the first time in an English orchestra. Orione was followed by Zanaida, etc.

His wife, Cecilia Bach, whose maiden name was Grassi, was by birth Italian. For several years she occupied the position of prima donna at the Operahouse, London, though she was far from handsome, and, moreover, used to stand upon the stage like an inanimate statue. In addition, however, to a very sweet voice, she possessed so much innocence of expression, and such pure intonation, that the auditor, being taken by surprise, listened to her with double pleasure. After her husband's death she returned to her native country, Italy.

THE STICK AS A MEDIUM OF MUSICAL INSTRUCTION.*

King Frederick II. of Prussia turned his attention at an early age to music. Frederick I., the most eccentric personage, probably, of his day, had a horror of the art. While heir to the throne, Frederick II. could not practise on his beloved flute any where but in a sequestered grotto, round which he stationed scouts, charged to warn him when the emissaries sent by the King to surprise him were too near.

Frederick II. was not particularly proud of the battles which his genius enabled him to gain. He was prouder of his verses than of the plans of his campaigns, and it was only after a great many precautions and a great amount of praise that Voltaire ventured to observe that the word crépe, forming two syllables, is not written crep, a style of orthography somewhat too Germanic. The King, however, had great pretensions to extreme delicacy of ear. He composed some detestable medleys for the flute, and thought this fact rendered him the most accomplished judge of musical matters in his kingdom. His favourite composers were Hasse, Graun, part of whose works have been lost, and Agricola, who was overtaken by the same misfortune (or, perhaps, out of regard for his fame, we might rather say, good luck); the works of all other composers were hateful to his Majesty.

The following was the course pursued by the great King during the rehearsals held at the Court of Berlin. In the first place, the reader must remember that, though he played the flute tolerably, the King of Prussia had no ear for music. What must have been the position to which those singers were reduced, who had gone to seek their fortune with the friend of Voltaire and of Lamettrie! The conductor, standing on a platform slightly raised, gave the signal to commence. Frederick was seated behind him, with his walking-stick in his hand. It was thus that he superintended the piece performed under the direction of the chapelmaster. Unfortunately, Frederick, as I have said, did not possess a correct ear, and numerous examples prove, at the present day, that such persons want to appear more susceptible than those who do. King Frederick, therefore, like a spider watching a fly, superintended in his own fashion the behaviour of his singers, and if, in the course of the piece, any rich bit of harmony, of which the excellent director of the orchestra had been guilty, happened to shock the royal ears, the King chastised (for the truth must be told) with his cane the unfortunate artists who had merely carried out the composer's intentions. I shall, perhaps, be told that they might have escaped by flight from such humiliating treatment; I would merely draw attention to the fact that any vocalist endeavouring to run away from the admiration, and the canings, of the illustrious dilettante, would have exposed himself to the risk of being shut up for the remainder of his days in a fortress, which he certainly would have been, had the King once threatened to inflict such a punishment on him. Mdlle. Anna Mehlig, the Hanoverian pianist, is in the United States, earning golden opinions from the classical connoisseurs. That Mdlle' Alida Topp should be there also is no fault of Miss Anna Mehlig's.

Now that M. Pasdeloup has resigned, the artists at the Théâtre-Lyrique wish to carry on the season themselves. As a preliminary, they ask a double subvention; which the minister of Fine Arts hopes they may get, but cannot exactly see how.

Rumour says that M. Litolff's defunct opera-concerts are to be revived on new and solid bases. The Minister of Fine Arts promises a subvention. The works of Gounod, Liszt, Berlioz, Wagner, and Rubinstein are to be performed; where, then, are the great masters?

The members of the Upper Norwood Tonic Sol-fa Class gave their eighteenth concert on Monday week, when the programme included selections from the works of Handel, and other eminent composers. The members acquitted themselves to the satisfaction of a large audience. Herr R. Beringer was at the pianoforte.

In England there is a growing tendency to use churches for the performance of oratorios and other sacred works; but in New York our "go-ahead" cousins are so far in advance that Watson's Art Journal, in describing a recent entertainment at Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, tells us that "the programme was confined to opera music."—Choir.

The Choir informs its readers that, "at his last organ recital at Edinburgh, Professor Oakeley stated that in that city not the slightest prejudice exists against the works of Schumann, and that his works are received there with almost German enthusiasm." This is very kind on the part of the people of Edinburgh and very considerate on the part of Professor Oakeley.

The National Musical Convention in the United States, to the formation of which we alluded some months since, seems to be making rapid progress. In the Massachusetts alone the number of choralists who have enrolled themselves under the auspices of the association already amounts to upwards of 7000, representing sixty-seven societies. —Choir.

The titles given to musical associations are sometimes strangely at variance with the nature of music they perform; and thus it is no uncommon thing to find a Bach Society devoting itself to Mendelssohn, or a Schumann Society which studiously avoids the compositions of that clever but ill-fated writer. New York furnishes a fresh instance of this want of harmony in the name and objects of its musical organizations, the recently formed "Church Music Association" announcing the first act of Weber's Oberon as a prominent item in its opening concert!

Here is a criticism on Berlioz's King Lear overture, taken from the New York Sun :—

"Schumann said he was always at a loss whether to consider Berlioz a genius or a charlatan, and certainly his Lear is a work that eminently conduces to that doubtful state of mind. Lear was a mad old king, and this is a mad old overture—so far so good; the music aptly illustrates the monarch, but Lear was at times something sober than mad, and into these moods Berlioz fails to follow him. The overture is fragmentary; an idea is no sooner taken freely in hand than it is dropped for another; the brass instruments are in a constant fever of climax and trouble!"

From a copy of the Service Paper, used at St. Andrew's Cathedral Sydney, N.W., which has been forwarded to us by one of our correspondents in the city, we observe that it is the custom not only to insert the names of the hymns, tunes, chants, and anthems, but also to give the titles of the organ voluntaries. This practice we have frequently commended to our readers, and we are glad to find that it has been adopted in many English churches. It can hardly fail to lead to a better appreciation, by the congregation, of the importance of this part of the musical service, while its influence on the organist must be equally satisfactory, causing him to arrange beforehand what he intends to play, instead of leaving the decision to the impulse of the moment, and leading him to suit his choice of subjects to the season of the Church's year. —Choir.

On a careful consideration of music of the day in Paris, it is difficult to come to any other conclusion that it is as bad as bad can be. In opera, Ambroise Thomas, a good mechanic at best, is shoved per force into the foremost place, his only competitor being Gounod (whose next work will make or mar him with the French public). As for mere ephemeral music, such as songs, romances, pianoforte pieces, &c., the publications of the day are simply wretched. Tune appears to have been sent into exile. It no longer exists. The modern ballad of France is invariably pretentious—like the people. It aims at something very much beyond what in England we used to consider the scope of a chamber song, and finishes commonly with being utterly absurd. This almost total want of melody, and superabundance of false sentiment, render French drawing-room music at present even worse than that of England.—Choir.

We have heard of mathematicians who have solved some of their most difficult problems while engaged in the most uncongenial pursuits, but an American journal places all such feats in the shade by telling us of an opera composed in a series of omnibus journays. This work, manifestly produced under difficulties, is entitled the Corsican Bride, from the pen of Mr. Edward Mollenhauer, a New York teacher of music. His only time for composition was, we are informed, that spent in driving to and from his pupils' houses; and in this painful manner he conceived the opera alluded to, which, we are not surprised to hear, was not a remarkable success. Although our contemporary kindly attributes his withdrawal from the boards to the assassination of poor Abraham Lincoln. Be this as it may, Mr. Mollenhauer is indefatigable, and has just completed a symphony, after the pictorial style designed to represent Collins' "Ode to the Passions." Let us hope this was written under more auspicious influences.—Choir.

JENA.—The 13th ult. was the hundredth anniversary of the foundation of the Academic Concerts, which have succeeded each other uninterruptedly longer than any other concerts in Germany, always excepting the celebrated Gewandhaus Concerts in Leipsic, the first of which was given one hundred and twenty-six years ago! In honour of the occasion, the Grand-Duke of Saxe-Weimar-Eisenach forwarded the Cross of the Order of the White Falcon, first class, to Dr. Carl Gille, managing director of the concerts, and the University presented him with the honorary diploma of Doctor of Philosophy. From Queen Augusta of Prussia Dr. Gille received the following letter:—"Taking, as I do to-day, so great an interest in everything that goes on in my country, I cannot refrain from expressing the sincere sympathy excited in my breast by the hundredth anniversary of the Academical Concerts in Jena, and, at the same time, from adding how much I appreciate the services which you, both as director, for many years, of these concerts, and as chairman of the Academical Musical Association of Germany, have rendered to the cause of our national art. May you long be spared to labour for it as successfully as hitherto, and to receive the thanks of all those who are interested in its development. Berlin, 17th January, 1870. Augusta." Herr Neumann, who, for the last ten years, has acted most efficiently as the musical director of the concerts, received the gold Medal for Civil Merit, from the Grand-Duke of Saxe-Weimar-Eisenach. The programme of the hundredth concert comprised:—Symphony in A major, Stade; Prologue, C. Dohm; "An die Künstler" (solos, chorus for male voices, and orchestra), Liszt; "Festival Overture," C. Lassen; Cantata, solos, chorus, and orchestra, C. Lassen; "Gaudeamus igitur," humorous piece, solos, chorus, and orchestra, Franz Liszt. The last three pieces were composed expressly for the anniversary. Some of the regulations laid down for the students taking part in the concerts a century ago are highly amusing, and serve to give an insight into what the student-life of the period must have been. One of the regulations, for instance, is, that no student shall appear in his dressing-gown or with curl-papers in his hair, but in clean clothing and linen, and with his hair properly arranged, or with a wig. Another regulation requires the students "to be quiet and act in a becoming manner at the concert, and not make a noise, or get into disputes; the viri academici are prohibited from seeing any females home."

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

The Monday Popular Concerts are now in their zenith. With the departure of that interesting violinist, Mdlle. Norman-Neruda, interesting not merely on account of her sex but on account of her remarkable genius, it might have been thought that their attraction, for a time, at least, would in a measure be lessened. But no such thing. Her place as leader of the quartets was promptly filled by Herr Ludwig Straus, one of the readiest and most versatile masters of the violin now existing, and one of those best acquainted with the chamber music of the great composers. At the first three concerts since Christmas Herr Straus led the quartets, with an ability that has long been recognized and frequently dwelt upon in fitting terms. Moreover, he has had Signor Piatti with him—"Emperor of violoncellists," as he is justly styled, and, to speak in familiar phrase, a solid comfort to any leader. Herr Straus's most striking performance was in the great C major "Rasoumowsky" quartet of Beethoven, which he led with equal judgment and spirit. The first three concerts were otherwise noticeable for the performance, by Madame Arabella Goddard and Signor Piatti, of two sonatas for pianoforte and violoncello—the one in D by Mendelssohn, and the one in A by Professor Sterndale Bennett, the last of which (prok pudor!) had never been introduced before to Mr. Chappell's intelligent public. Of even greater importance was the introduction (first time!), by Madame Goddard, of Wilhelm Friedemann Bach's Fantasia in A minor, and Joseph Woelfl's Introduction, Fugue, and Sonata in C minor—both masterpieces, both played magnificently (indeed, as no other pianist we are aware of could have played them), and both, like the violoncello duets, received with every token of delight.

Since then Herr Joseph Joachim has returned, and already appeared at four concerts—two morning and two evening. That Herr Joachim's reception on each occasion was enthusiastic need scarcely be added. He is the greatest foreign artist, and also (which does not invariably follow) the most popular, who, within the memory of the present generation, has been in the habit of favouring us with periodical visits. Herr Joachim's new yearly advent is always looked forward to as the chief event of the musical season. And if the highest and the purest art, revealed through the medium of art's worthiest representative, are taken into consideration, the chief event it unquestionably is. Herr Joachim's playing has long been accepted as something beyond criticism, and which can dispense with eulogy. To say that he has played no matter what, from John Sebastian Bach to Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, is equivalent to saying that it was played to absolute perfection. Were we to discuss anew the merits of the gifted Hungarian, whatever we might say would inevitably assume an air of platitude, so unanimously admitted is his supremacy, both by amateurs and professional musicians. How that supremacy was won, how earnestly and legitimately it has been maintained, is too old a story to repeat. It is, nevertheless, agreeable to look back to Herr Joachim's first appearance in this country, a quarter of a century ago, when he came, warmly recommended by Mendelssohn, and, though little more than twelve years of age, took the audience of the Philharmonic concerts (then the most trying ordeal for a new aspirant) by storm, in Beethoven's violin concerto; and to remember with what hearty spontaneity the wonderful talent of the boy was appreciated. Musical England, indeed, may be said to have been the first to recognize, at its full value, a genius now pronounced exceptional all over Germany. Even the amateurs of boasting Paris, where the sensation created by Herr Joachim, at the concerts of the Conservatoire, and those of M. Pasdeloup, was, in Parisian phrase, "hors ligne," only knew and applauded him after every tone of his instrument had, for twenty years and more, been pleasantly familiar to us on this side the Channel. Thanks to the Monday Popular Concerts, we have had Herr Joachim among us year after year, with scarcely an intermission, since 1859, when they were first established. And now, in a sentence, he returns to us with the same large style, the same noble simplicity of expression, the same grand tone, modulated with the same ease, and capable of the same niceties of gradation, the same splendid vigour and unerring mechanism, the same broad unaffected reading and healthy conception of every work submitted to him, and last, not least, the same disdain of ostentation and forgetfulness of self in the music he is interpreting, modest and dignified as it is rare, which proclaim the genuine great artist we have known and admired for all these years. We have said, more than once, on the occasion of Herr Joachim's coming back, that "he plays, if possible, still better than before;" and yet it was hardly possible to point out where improvement had been wanting, so perfect seemed his tone, so irreproachable his taste, and so masterly in every respect his handling of the fiddle. Nevertheless, an artist thus devoted to his art, thus absorbed in the music assigned to him, and thus utterly regardless of self-display, could not well stand still. Advance he of necessity must towards an ideal perfection of his own, to attain which, no matter how far on the road he might be at any given epoch, was the aim and end of his artistic being. We feel moved, then, again to say, even now, that to our thinking, Herr Joachim "plays, if possible, still better than before." We may be wrong, but such is our impression. We felt it in Beethoven's glorious C major quintet, which he selected for his first appearance—finding more humour in the scherzo, more depth of sentiment in the slow movement, and more fire and impetuosity in the finale than ever, and we felt it in the same composer's later work, the E flat quartet (No. 10), where the expression imparted to the divine adagio was as full of, heartfelt emotion as the never-ceasing melody itself. This quartet was the most conspicuous feature of the programme on the evening in question, which to the lovers of music who habitually frequent the Monday Popular Concerts was the bona-fide first appearance of their favourite. For reasons unnecessary to explain there is ordinarily little comparative enthusiasm exhibited at morning concerts; while at evening concerts, given the cause, there is ordinarily a great deal. True, at the Saturday Concerts, Herr Joachim is welcomed as he has a just right to expect to be welcomed, but on the Mondays his reception is always overwhelming. Not only his quartet playing but his solo playing is now again the theme of universal and well placed admiration. Witness the furore created by his wonderful execution of J. S. Bach's wonderful Chaconne in D minor, with its multitude of variations, the one, coming from his bow and fingers, more interesting and surprising than the other, although each is given with as affectionate a solicitude as if it were paramount. Not content with this, the audience, after twice calling back Herr Joachim, continued applauding so persistently that he had no choice but to play again. To repeat the Chaconne was out of the question; so he substituted an allegro from one of the other sonatas of Bach (in C major), his execution of which was not a whit less marvellous than his execution of the other. On Saturday afternoon Herr Joachim led Mendelssohn's quintet for string instruments, in B flat, Op. 87 (one of the "Posthumous" publications), which is always agreeable to hear, not merely because it is a truly grand work, but because it was the first piece in the programme of the first Monday Popular Concert, in the year of foundation (February 14th, 1859). He also joined Mr. Hallé and Signor Piatti, in Schubert's trio in E flat; the learned pianist, so long associated with the Monday Popular Concerts, choosing for solo, Beethoven's sonata in D major (No. 3, Op. 10), which he plays so often and with such elaborate finish. The singer was Miss Edith Wynne—always welcome. We must not omit to say that at the other concerts the pianoforte was worthily represented by Herr Pauer—who, in a sonata by Mozart, and Mendelssohn's Fantasia in F sharp minor (the "Sonate Ecossaise"), as well as in Beethoven's C minor trio (Op. 3, the finest of the set, though the one which Haydn recommended Beethoven not to publish), and the B flat trio of Schubert, about which Schumann wrote so enthusiastically (with Herr Joachim and Signor Piatti), showed alike his versatility and his talent.

At the concert on Monday night, by no means the least interesting of the present series, the programme was as follows:—

PART I.

Quartet, in D major, No. 10, strings	.. .. ..	Mozart.
8-ng, "Kennst du das Land"	.. .. ..	Beethoven.
Variations brièuses, pianoforte	.. ..	Mendelssohn.

PART II.

Chaconne, violin, with pianoforte accompaniment	.. ..	Vitali.
Songs, { "Wenn ich früh in den Garten geh"	.. ..	Schumann.
{ "Die Post"	.. ..	Schubert.
Trio, D major. Op. 70, pianoforte, violin, and violoncello	..	Beethoven.

The quartet is now composed of Herr Joachim, Herr L. Ries, Herr L. Straus, and Signor Piatti, and is so to remain until the end of the season—Herr Straus, himself so competent a leader, having consented to play the viola (hitherto held with great ability by Signor Zerbini) at all the concerts to come. Anything more melodious, ingenious, and beautiful than Mozart's quartet—known as "No. 10," although really his 23rd work of the kind—can hardly be imagined, or anything more absolutely irreproachable than the performance, by Herr Joachim and his coadjutors. That the work was thoroughly enjoyed, and the players called back at the end, will easily be credited. The exquisite slow movement (in G) would have been heard again with satisfaction. This was only the second hearing vouchsafed at the Monday Popular Concerts to one of the genuine masterpieces of the most genuine of all the masters of melody and counterpoint combined.

The Ciaconna of Tomaso Vitali, a celebrated violinist of the early part of last century, is constructed upon the same plan as that of Bach (already referred to), but is as inferior to Bach as brass to gold. Granted, there may be a certain monotony in the perpetual maintenance of the same key, to which Bach, Handel, &c., adhere in their suites and variations, we, nevertheless, can see no improvement in the perpetual shifting of keys, through the medium of queer progressions and forced transitions, as exemplified in this laboured composition by Vitali, who, though he is said to have given lessons to the renowned Padre Martini, might, with advantage, some time latter, have received lessons, in form and harmony at least, from Martini in return. But whatever the merits of the composition, the performance of this hitherto unknown Ciaconna, by Herr Joachim (accompanied on the pianoforte, by Mr. Benedict, in a style not easy to surpass), was such as to raise the enthusiasm of the audience to so high a pitch that the whole had to be repeated from beginning to end. The pianist on Monday was Mr. Franklin Taylor, who had already, some time ago, won his spurs at St. James's Hall, and who is favourably known at the concerts directed by Mr. Manns at the Crystal Palace. This gentleman is an artist in the truest sense of the word. Whatever piece he brings before the public he has so completely mastered that scarcely a flaw can be detected in his performance. On the present occasion he gave the seventeen Variations Sérieuses of Mendelssohn in a style with which the composer himself would have been satisfied. The reading was admirable, the execution irreproachable throughout, and at the end Mr. Taylor was unanimously called back to the platform. Among all the new pianists introduced by Mr. Chappell of recent years, Mr. Franklin Taylor is incomparably the best. Not only does he excel as a solo player; but, as was proved in his performance with Herr Joachim and Signor Piatti, of Beethoven's great trio in D major, he is equally at home in concerted music. We have rarely heard this trio better executed. Mr. Taylor showed himself worthy of his associates—higher praise than which could not be bestowed.

A word of hearty eulogy is due to Mdlle. Carola, who gave Beethoven's exquisite setting of the song of Goethe's Mignon, not only with perfect taste, but with genuine dramatic feeling, and who was scarcely less happy in Schumann's pretty Lied and the inimitable "Post" of the too early lost Schubert. Altogether the concert was one of the very best of the year.

On Monday next Madame Schumann is to play, and the programme will include, among other things, her husband's quintet, in E flat, for pianoforte and string instruments.

NEW MUSIC.

Some time ago we noticed Messrs. Ashdown & Parry's new edition of Mozart's pianoforte sonatas. It was our duty to speak very favourably of the issue, and also of the manner in which the editor, Mr. Walter Macfarren, had done his work. We have now before us an appropriate sequel, in the shape of Mozart's miscellaneous compositions for the household instrument, published by the same firm. In thirty two numbers. The edition is, as regards paper and print, an edition de luxe; no expense having been spared to produce it in the best style. With respect to the music, we wish it could be said that nothing is needed in the way of recommendation. The fact is, however, that looking at the character of these works, their comparative easiness and absolute beauty, pianoforte players, generally, are ignorant of them to an astounding degree. Admitting public taste to be as low as it is sometimes represented, there is no reason at all why Mozart's miscellaneous compositions should not be in general use; because, while perfect works of art, they have attractions all must feel. Evidently, then, this music has only to be more widely known; and there is reason for congratulation upon Messrs Ashdown & Parry's enterprise. Of the thirty-two numbers, twenty-one are devoted to as many "Variations," beginning with those on an original theme in G major, written at the age of nine years, and ending with those on Pruendun cunfter Hersemstriche, which are of doubtful authenticity. Mr. Macfarren has included several other works, thought to be spurious by commentators like Jahn and Köchel. Of this nobody will complain, because so long as there is any doubt, it is well to preserve the music. Moreover, the doubt is proof that the subject of it has merit of no ordinary sort. Besides the Variations, there are three Rondos, a Minuetto, a Gigue, two Fantasias, a Fantasie and Fugue, a Suite de Pièces, an Adagio, and a Romance. Here, then, is a mass of pianoforte music adapted to moderate capacity and ordinary comprehension. We recommend it heartily to all who, with tastes above the fashionable trash of the day, are not able to meet the requirements of music classical but difficult. One word more—each number can be had separately.

Messrs. Duncan Davison & Co. have published the music of Un Anno ad un Giorno, operetta, composed by Jules Benedict." This we believe is an early work of the esteemed musician, and was originally produced in Italy. The plot of the operetta we do not know. Doubtless, however, it will appear in due course, and have the public trial which, if worthy of the music, it deserves. The music is in seven numbers. First, a duet, "Vieni, o care," for soprano and mezzo-soprano, in B flat, marked by pleasant graceful melody and elegant treatment of details. A cavatina for mezzo-soprano, "Oh! che rabbia," is prefaced by a masterly recitative, and itself dashes along, tempo di Polacca, with an exuberance of spirit which never becomes boisterous, though it has a show piece this is worth the study of any lady to master its phrases. The accompaniments are charming. "Al campo della gloria" is an aria for baritone, straightforward, vigorous, and characteristic. With its words done into appropriate English, this song ought to become popular among amateurs, for whose use it is in many respects adapted. "Ciel che ma veggio," a duet for soprano and baritone, is an elaborate number, of considerable pretensions, written throughout in the genuine Italian style. The spirit of the words is caught with happy facility, and the music flows on as though by its own volition, so free and spontaneous is it. The fifth number, a duet, "Infelice, poverino," for soprano and mezzo-soprano, is more adapted to the average capacity. Like the first, its themes are marked by easy grace, and the whole is elegantly written. A Romanza for mezzo-soprano, "Pastorella," is hardly so striking as the preceding numbers. It contains, however, a good second subject, which supplies an effective contrast. The finale, an air for soprano, "Che più dirvi," with chorus, brings the work to a pleasant end. By reproducing this operetta, Messrs. Davison & Co. have done good service to those who love true Italian music, and to the reputation of its composer. Mr. Benedict, looking upon his earlier work, even with the light of larger experience and ripened powers, can hardly be other than glad that public attention is now directed to it.

Some publications by Messrs. Robert Cocks & Co. now claim attention. "The Suez Quadrille," by Adam Wright has a bird's-eye view of M. de Lesseps' work on its title-page, which is really worth the price of the whole. There is nothing specially noticeable in Mr. Wright's music. "My First Ball Quadrille," by J. Pridham, is elegantly adorned by the picture of a very young gentleman à la Watteau, tendering a bouquet to a very young lady also à la Watteau. The themes used are mostly familiar airs; and their treatment well adapts them to young performers. The "Happy Dreams Waltz," by J. Pridham, represents on its title-page a sleeping baby cradled in a floating shell, with a gigantic peacock's feather as a parasol. This must have been the "happy dream" referred to, we imagine. Mr. Pridham's music is elegant enough to be played for its own sake. Much of it more, some of his phrases seem to us fresh. The "April Showers Waltz," by Biggerstaff, does not make much attract us. Mr. Adam Wright's "Twilight Polka," on the other hand, is a very agreeable thing of its kind, having a pretty and rythmical melody. "Little Nelly's Quadrille," by Alfred Scott Gatty, is of course adapted to little Nelly's small hands and juvenile capacity. In these respects its object is attained. "I really am so sleepy," words and music by Alfred Scott Gatty, is, at all events, a harmless comic song. It may be sung in the drawing-rooms of very good people without offence. This is so uncommon a merit that we are inclined to dwell upon it. If well delivered it will succeed to amuse.

"Evening" (Augener & Co), a four part song by Seymour Smith, is well written, with much feeling for the words. Mr. Smith, having the gifts enabling him to do so much, must now try to produce music which shall not remind us of what we have heard before. Nearly every phrase in "Evening" suggests a reminiscence. "Arise, sweet, arise" (Hutchins & Romer) is a Revellée by W. Alfred Gibbs, which, to elegant verses, unites simple and appropriate music. We can commend this song as alike meritorious and unpretentious. Mr. Wrighton's ballad, "The Friend we had at School" (Metzler & Co.), is simply a reproduction of things used a thousand times, and, therefore, need not detain us. The case is otherwise with "Marjorie's Almanack" (Metzler & Co.), in which Madame Sainton-Dolby's name her undoubted power as a song writer. This elegant, albeit simple ballad, is, however, one of sufficient attractiveness to hold its own way without help from us. Nevertheless, we must say that those who want something pretty, easy, and interesting, should purchase "Marjorie's Almanack." "I stood once more by the old Church style" (Metzler & Co.) is another of Madame Sainton-Dolby's recent productions. Its character differs from the one just noticed, but that it will be found adapted to many tastes we have not the smallest doubt. "Winter and Spring" (Ashdown & Parry) a song by Bellenden Kerr Atkins, has some excellent words, set in an original and effective style. There are many good points about it, upon which we should like to dwell. But enough that Mr. Atkins's song is far above the average, and well worth attention.

Herr Friedrich Grützmacher, the well-known violoncellist, is now making a professional tour, in the course of which he will visit Frankfort-on-the-Maine, Nuremberg, Mayence, Darmstadt, Mannheim, and Heidelberg. He will also visit Switzerland.

MUSIC AS A MORAL AGENT.

Music is as ancient as the world itself. Were it necessary to cite authorities to prove this, we should be only embarrassed which to select. In all times man has sung himself, or made instruments do so. But, even had this not been the case, the birds of the air would be sufficient to attest that music was synchronous with Creation. What appears new in this art, and what is so really, is the form it has assumed since the sixteenth century. Until the time of Monteverde, who introduced in harmony the chord of the seventh on the dominant, music possessed a religious character of expression which it preserved even in productions of a light description. Nearly all the airs of this period have a tender, melancholy, unctuous expression, essentially distinguishing them from modern music. The least practised ear recognises in them an element not to be found elsewhere. Generally, they are characterized by a vague sadness which penetrates the soul. We feel in them something strange and contrary to our habits; a mixture, apparently, of religious and profane emotions. Old people are fond of hearing these ancient songs, and young people do not despise them.

For musicians who are tolerably well read, there is no mystery about the character peculiar to these compositions. We find in such good old airs the last vestiges of the ancient tonal system. It is still plain-song, with its varied modes, which breathes in the strain, gay or sad. Hence the slightly religious expression which is mixed up with the mundane ideas of the poetry. If we take a madrigal by Monteverde or by Palestrina, we shall be struck by the mystic colouring we have just described. It exists in all the works of this epoch, and maintained its footing so long, that the compositions of the eighteenth century are not completely free from it.

Even in our own days, this mitigated form of the ancient system of tonality has been employed. Meyerbeer has put it in the mouth of the Anabaptists of his Prophète. The effect is striking. This ought not to surprise us, for it would seem to be the property of music to reflect the human soul, which is, by nature, profoundly sad. But may we not start from this point to search for a system of musical action on the stage; shall fully and perfectly satisfy the idea we have formed of this great art. Music, in its actual form, dates only from yesterday. Since modern tonality has introduced human passions into the lyrical drama, master-pieces have been written, but no direction has been given to the genius of musicians to follow. The way in which they grope about in their inspirations proves plainly that music is a new art. For the last century, no man of genius has appeared without a revolution being the result. Such was the case with Rameau, with Gluck, on the stage; with Mozart and Beethoven, in the symphony. Each of these names, and we might cite a great many more, represents a phase of musical art. There is a subversion of ideas attached to it. These men, perfectly unappreciated at the outset, have afterwards been greeted with rapture, because they caused art, which was considered stationary, to advance a step.

At the present day, however, after proclaiming that music is favourable to the moral progress of nations, we seemed to have stopped at a decisive form, of which the most sublime prototype is to be found in the works of Mozart.

Despite of such musicians as are led away by pride or by incapacity, the musical horizon is clearing up more and more in the direction of Germany. The classic land of the Lied and of the Symphony is trembling as at the dawn of a new era. Philosophers and poets are gazing intently at a point which stands out from the night, and casts far, very far into the future, a strong light, inundating the human ant-hill. A name, which never vibrates on respectful lips without finding an immediate response, has been, for some years past, pronounced all along the banks of the Rhine, and repeated beyond the frontiers of the North. This name, which we just now wrote, is that of Mozart! Mozart the golden-mouthed, as he is called by an eminent critic, in reference to his Christian name of Chrysostom.

All men's eyes are turned towards this luminous name. As the distance becomes greater between us and the saintly existence of the author of Don Juan, the more do his works free themselves from the veil of the Past; they appear to us more radiant and more pure, as though they had borrowed the light of eternity from their composer's immortal soul.

This slow, instinctive, and universal return towards the source of light, of which every spark is destined to kindle a world of ideas, is a happy reaction for art. It is an incontestable proof of an ancient alliance between music and man. We draw nearer Mozart, because no other musician has collected in his heart the human affections which flowed over in the heart of Mozart. We perceive moving in this great man's music all that constitutes the life of our souls. His music is the very epopee of nations. It is constituted of hopes, of sadness, of recollections, and of aspirations. It is religious, for it seeks God in the blue sky; it is Christian and democratic, because it breathes a love for all created beings and things. We see, therefore, in the conceptions of Mozart, the argument proving that music is really destined to effect the civilization of nations. If by civilization we understand the development of the moral faculties, a greater outpouring of heart, and a stronger bond, founded on profounder convictions, between individuals, it is the works of Mozart which should be taken as a basis, by musicians, as well as by statesmen who entertain the legitimate notion of rendering the masses moral by the medium of music.

As we said at the commencement, fine music is at bottom melancholy. This is true of the two centuries and a half which succeeded the introduction of the modern system of tonality, as it is of all that has been done previously to that event. It is by this elegiac element that music first obtained possession of man's sympathy. It is by this that music will act upon future generations.

There is always a certain amount of sadness at the bottom of human affairs. Mozart expresses joy with a charm peculiar to himself, because it was a part of his delicate nature to perceive the mixed composition of it. That musician alone will live and regenerate the world who will identify himself most completely with man. Music must excite great thoughts; place itself in communication with the soul; and foster everything good and generous which the latter contains.

Reader, you have heard the wonderful harmonies in Don Juan and in Die Zauberflöte. You have felt touched, as by the reminiscences of the years of your youth. It was in fact those reminiscences whose song was heard in your heart. Your fond dreams returned; the sweet faces you loved bent once more over you. You loved your mother, your sister, your fair and gentle companions, running on the sward. The Sundays, all ablaze with sunshine, appeared again before you, with the young girls and their cool boddices and their free-and-easy bonnets, fluttering with ribbands. You gazed on a form, which was that of an angel, as it fled into the welcome shade of the wood; you listened to sounds which resembled the rustling of wings; and you thought of the vision which follows us in life; which never quits the firmament in which our eyes are fixed, and which goes before us, like the Star of the Shepherds. You heard voices which never advocated apostacy, treason, egotism, falsehood, or cowardice. You listened to those voices which sang to you in the spring of life, like the song of birds in the morning of Nature. Those voices commanded you to love, and to attach but little value to the rest. As you listened to them in the grand and magical symphonies of Mozart, you felt you were a better man. Your soul opened more freely. The tears started to your eyes—tears at the recollection of those who were absent. You felt strengthened; you felt fresh youth; you felt you were purified from the stains of life by the effect which the chaste accents of such Divine music produced in you. You thought as you thought when you were twenty; you loved as you loved at that age, which is blessed by Heaven; and your Ideal, the beloved One, regarding you from her azure throne, said: 'Tis well!

NEW SOUTH WALES.

Rossini's Messe Solennelle was performed at the Sydney Academy of Music recently, and a local critic says of the affair:—

"The part-singers included Signor Ugo Devoti, David Dickson. Esq., Mrs. W. J. Cordner, Miss Kosten, Miss Wiseman, and other vocalists of repute. The orchestra—a large and well-trained one—was under the leadership of Mr. John Hill, Mus. Bac., Mr. W. J. Cordner acting as accompanist. The great attraction of the evening was, of course, the Messe Solennelle. It was certainly a rich feast, and was keenly appreciated. It opens solemnly with the 'Kyrie.' 'Gratius Agimus' was received with favour by the audience. The 'Domine Deus,' sung by Signor Devoti, is an air of great vigour, and was rendered by him to entire satisfaction. 'Qui Tollis,' duet—Miss Kosten and Mrs. Cordner, with harp and harmonium accompaniment—was exquisitely rendered. 'Quoniam tu solus,' was sung by David Dickson, Esq., in the most artistic manner. The 'Credo' was much admired and artistically chanted. 'Crucifixus,' an air of great pathos, was exquisitely rendered by Miss Kosten, who is rapidly increasing in favour with the public. 'O Salutaris'—Mrs. W. J. Cordner, accompanied by Mr. J. Hill, K.S., R.A.M., on the harmonium—was one of the most agreeable numbers in the work, both from the lady's excellent singing and the smooth accompaniment. The 'Sanctus' was rendered with great care. It evoked loud plaudits. 'Agnus Dei,' rendered by Mrs. J. W. Cordner, was pronounced by many the finest number in the work. It was sung with great pathos and feeling, moving the audience to a high state of enthusiasm. Altogether the evening's entertainment passed off in a most satisfactory manner, and appeared to be most heartily enjoyed."

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

Mr. Franklin Taylor.

With reference to this gentleman's performance last Monday, the Daily News says:—

"At this week's concert Mr. Franklin Taylor made his second appearance as solo pianist, the first occasion having been so long back as January, 1866, when his excellent performance of Beethoven's Sonata in D, from Op. 10, was duly commented on. Again we have to notice this gentleman's highly cultivated mechanism and sound artistic feeling, as evidenced in his playing of Mendelssohn's Variations Sérieuses, that admirable piece in which the composer has proved, as Bach, Handel, and Beethoven had done before him, that a form of musical treatment, which is too frequently the vehicle of shallow flippancy and frivolity, may be made the medium of high and noble thought. These variations of Mendelssohn are classed as Op. 54, and were composed at Leipsic in 1841. A letter by the composer, dated July 15, in that year (addressed to his friend Küngemann), contains this passage:—'Do you know what I have been recently composing with enthusiasm? Variations for the piano—actually eighteen on a theme in D minor, and they amused me so famously that I instantly made fresh ones on a thema in E flat major, and now, for the third time, on a theme in B flat major. I feel quite as if I must make up for lost time, never having written any before.' The piece referred to is one of the many instances of how slight a suggestion will serve to elicit brilliant illustrative comment from high genius and acquirements—standing, in fact, in worthy association with those marvellous thirty-two variations, by Beethoven, on a trite subject apparently little calculated for such splendid illustration. Mr. F. Taylor's performance of Mendelsohn's variations was so masterly a display of executive skill and appreciative judgment, that it becomes a matter of wonder that he should only have been once before heard at these concerts, and that at an interval of four years. The applause bestowed on Mr. Taylor, and his recall, testified to the general impression made on the audience. In Beethoven's noble trio in D major (from Op. 70), the pianist also proved his high qualities as an interpreter of classical music; his associates being Herr Joachim and Signor Piatti, which is as much as to say that the violin and violoncello parts were rendered to perfection."

SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS.

Mr. Wood began a second series of conc-rts in Exeter Hall on Saturday evening, and again had the support of a large audience. No alteration was made in the character of the programme, which contained, besides vocal music, Beethoven's symphony in C minor, Mr. Nicolai's overture to The Merry Wives of Windsor, the brilliant prelude to La Gazza Ladra, and Weber's Concert-stück for piano (Miss Madeline Schiller) and orchestra. The purely orchestral works were rendered in good style, best of all being the larghetto of the symphony. Miss Schiller played in the Concert-stück with great spirit and facility. She was still more successful in a less exacting piece by Ascher. Mdme. Addyes Scott, Miss Helen D'Alton, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Signor Foli appeared as vocalists. Unfortunately, Mr. Reeves was compelled by hoarseness to break off in the middle of his first song. The necessary apology made by Mr. Leslie was frankly accepted, and the disabled artist retired amid well nigh unanimous applause.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

At the Crystal Palace on Saturday an entire programme was devoted to Mendelssohn, by way of celebrating the composer's birth, which took place on the 3rd of February, 1809. The festival—if it may be called—was of modest dimensions, its sole object being the unassuming recognition of an anniversary more or less interesting to all musical people. For this purpose the selection made from Mendelssohn's compositions was sufficient. It began with the overture to Athalie, a work not often heard apart from the cantata to which it belongs. There is no reason, however, why a prelude so brilliant and masterly should not be used as a concert overture. To amateurs it is profoundly interesting, and from the general public its many effective touches can hardly fail to command attention. This was eminently the case on Saturday, thanks, in some degree, to one of the most magnificent performances ever heard, even at the Crystal Palace. The hymn, "Hear my prayer," following, pleased. Lemmens-Sherrington took the alto part. Next to his oratorios nothing of Mendelssohn's is better known or more esteemed than the music in which the Psalmist's longing for rest finds expression. Its performance is always very welcome, and hence the rendering of Saturday was disappointing. Mdme. Sherrington sang in the final movement, "O for the wings of a dove," so slowly that the effect was almost entirely lost. After the air from St. Paul, "Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets," had been given by Miss Sophie Vinta, the Lobgesang was performed under conditions happily rare. Mr. Vernon Rigby telegraphed his inability to sing at so late an hour. that a substitute could not be found; and the important tenor music must have been left out had not Mdme. Sherrington volunteered to sing it. The generous and somewhat daring offer was, of course, accepted, with a most successful result, so far, at least, as concerned the lady. Omitting only "He counteth all your sorrows," Madame Sherrington gave all the tenor solos, and did so with a correctness which fully earned the applause of the audience. Not even in "We called through the darkness" was she once at fault. Of course the music suffered to some extent by the change of voice, especially "My song shall alway be Thy mercy," the effect which as a duet for two sopranos was peculiar. The second soprano was taken by Miss Sophie Vinta, whose correct and tasteful singing in "I waited for the Lord," deserves recognition. It can hardly be needful to say that the symphonic movements were admirably played, or that the chorus, now fast improving, sang their familiar music with correctness and spirit.

MR. LESLIE'S CONCERTS.

The first of these concerts for the present season took place in St. James's Hall on Thursday evening week, and was attended by a large audience. The programme was varied in character, but, as usual, the madrigals and part-songs sung by the Choir formed the chief attraction. Several novelties were introduced, among them a setting of Longfellow's "Curfew," by Henry Smart, which made considerable effect; Mr. J. G. Callcott's "The day is now dying" (encored), a well written and expressive composition; and Thomas Morley's capital madrigal, "Shoot, false love." All those, though sung for the first time, were given to perfection. In point of fact, it matters little to Mr. Leslie's Choir what they attempt, the result being invariable success. Among the works more or less known were included Beale's "Come let us join the roundelay," Willbye's "Sweet honey-sucking bees," Leslie's "When the shades of eve descending," (encored), and Mendelssohn's "You stole my love" (encored). The solo vocalist was Mr. Sims Reeves, who first gave "Adelaide," accompanied by Mr. Callcott, in his best and most artistic style. He next sang Bishop's "Pilgrim of Love," and consented to repeat it at the persistent solicitation of the audience. Finally the popular tenor gave "Tom Bowling" in the inimitable fashion with which everybody must be familiar. Webbe's "When winds breathe soft," and Elliott's "Come, see what pleasures" were sung by the Concert Glee Union, but not as we could have wished. In behoven Mr. Leslie to consider whether a performance below the average excellence of his concerts is not a mistake. To supply instrumental music Mr. Leslie engaged the Amonsic Union, consisting of Messrs. Shakespeare, Crozier, Lazarus, C. Harper, and Wootton. These excellent artists played the whole of Beethoven's quintet in E flat (Op. 16) and the andante from Mozart's quintet in the same key. Such music so rendered was very welcome and proportionately enjoyed. Mr. Leslie conducted as usual.

At the next concert the music to Antigone will be performed; and Herr Joachim will play Beethoven's concerto for violin.

BENEVOLENT FUND OF THE SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

On Tuesday evening week the annual general meeting of the governors and friends of the above useful charity was held in Exeter Hall. The chair was taken by Mr. D. Hill, treasurer, in the absence (from ill health) of the president, Mr. J. N. Harrison. The chairman expressed his regret at the indisposition of their honoured president, and also lamented the absence from ill-health, not of a serious character, of their constant and judicious friend, Mr. Brewer, whom he eulogized not only as the founder of the Sacred Harmonic Society, but as having been greatly instrumental, through his learned researches into ancient civic records, in reviving and expanding the almost unknown Carpenters' Charity, which now takes a prominent position as the City of London School, and is one of the most important educational institutions of the period. Mr. Pattick, honorary secretary, read a report of the state and operations of the fund. He stated that the sum of £147 had been expended in relief; that the total income of the charity was £176; a small debt due to the treasurer had been liquidated, and a balance of £9 16s. 2d. remained in hand. The invested fund now consisted of £2,850 New Three per Cent. stock. Mr. Black suggested the formation of a supplemental committee of ladies as visitors. Liberal contributions were announced from the Duchess of Northumberland, Mr. R. S. Bowley, Mr. J. N. Harrison, and others, in response to an appeal to increase the permanent fund. Votes of thanks to the chairman, committee, and officers, concluded the business of the evening.

Rome.—The Abbate Franz Liszt is working upon a poem, King Stephen, "treated in the Hungarian style," whatever that may be. According to report, the work is intended to inaugurate the series of Philharmonic concerts at Pesth next winter.

PROVINCIAL.

BIRMINGHAM.—Our own correspondent writes from the hardware capital (so called) as follows:—

"It only needed a couple of quartets at the concert in the Town Hall, on the 4th instant, to have made me believe that I was at a veritable 'Monday Popular,' for there were Madame Norman-Neruda and Mr. Charles Hallé with a selection of pieces mostly classical, and Mr. Sims Reeves with 'Adelaide,' while more than one work (notably the pianoforte sonata in C, Op. 53, Beethoven, dedicated to Count Waldstein, and the familiar sonata in A for the same instrument and violin, best known as the 'Kreutzer') carried my mind very distinctly to St. James's Hall, and the delightful weekly gatherings which Mr. Arthur Chappell has now made one of the musical institutions of London. The highly favourable impression created by the accomplished lady violinist, on her first visit, was more than confirmed on this occasion, and should Madame Norman-Neruda again find herself in this smoky hive of industry (so called), she may safely count upon a cordial reception. To expatiate upon the qualities of Madame Neruda's playing is needless, as they are now so fully recognized by the London public, while not a few of the leading provincial towns have had the opportunity of thoroughly endorsing the verdict so promptly and unanimously recorded in the metropolis. Neither is it necessary to dilate on the playing of so veteran an artist as Mr. Hallé, who is quite appreciated at Birmingham. The appearance of Mr. Reeves was eagerly looked for (illness having unfortunately prevented him from fulfilling his last two engagements here), and the welcome which rang through the Town Hall was such as is accorded only to so special a favourite, while his singing was in every way as perfect and artistic as ever. The disappointment felt by the public when our greatest singer is deberred, by sickness from coming before them is a convincing tribute to his attraction; but it should be borne in mind, that to Mr. Reeves himself the disappointment is of a much more substantial and serious character, and that he, no more than the rest of the world, is likely to neglect the means of making money unless absolutely obliged to do so, while there is always this consolation in knowing that when he does appear, the most hypercritical cannot find fault with his singing. Despite the most wretched weather imaginable, the Town Hall was crowded in every part, and the concert was a complete success.—BRYTON OF BANNISTER."

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.—We take the following from the Northern' Daily Express, of February 8th:—

"Last night, Mr. Hare's concert took place in the New Town Hall and proved a very gratifying success. The artists comprised Mdme Sinico, Mdme. Arabella Goddard, Miss Edmonds, Mr. Santley, and Herr Wilhelmj. The programme was of a very recherché description, but in several instances was somewhat seriously departed from. Madame Sinico gave Arditi's 'Bolero,' and received an encore, to which she responded by singing the 'Flower Song,' from Faust. Miss Edmonds contributed greatly to the charming ensemble by her chaste-ness of feeling and truth of expression. To descant at length on the excessive merits of Madame Goddard's pianoforte playing would indeed be 'to gild refined gold, to paint the lily.' With a single exception, we know of no pianist who can at all compare with this lady in elevation of style, intellectual appreciation of a composer's intention, and in her extraordinary command of mechanical resources. The fine fantasia on airs from La Muette de Portici, Beethoven's glorious sonata in G (Op. 30), and Handel's well-known 'Harmonious Blacksmith,' were each played to admiration, and ensured the wrapt attention of the audience to the final note. Mr Santley was encored for every solo, and sang, in addition to the pieces on the programme, Arditi's inspiriting 'Stirrup Cup,' Virginia Gabriel's 'Cleansing Fire,' and that grand old national air, 'Hearts of Oak,' by Dr. Boyce. It is needless to say how magnificently these were declaimed by the greatest English baritone of modern times. The extraordinary violin playing of Herr Wilhelmj was in our opinion, the feature of this musical evening. This gentleman plays upon a Stradivarius Cremona, of unequalled tone and power, and priceless value. We should say £1,000 would not be badly invested in the purchase of such a wonderful instrument. In his first solo he executed a cadenza of octaves, some astonishing feats in double stopping and shakes in octaves, in a manner that has never been equalled in this town. In the second part he performed a réverie by Vieuxtemps, and a sarabine by Raff, in superb style."

KENDAL.—The following is condensed from an article in a local paper:—

"On Tuesday last a full-dress evening concert was given at the Town Hall, with Madame Florence Lancia, and an orchestra of thirteen members of Charles Hallé's band:—viz., first violins, Herr Otto Bernhardt and Signor Risegari; second violins, Mr. Ambrose Lee and Mons. Vetter; tenor, Mons. Chas. Bastenz; double bass, Herr Kliegl; clarionet, Mr. Gledney; flute, Mons. Edw. Jong; trumpet, Mr. Ellwood; bassoon, Signor Ranà; drum, Mr. Battley; horns, Greuner and Herr Bahr. The concert was in great part instrumental, but—placeux dames—the first mention should be made of the lady who represented vocal art, and represented it so well. In 'Lo! hear the gentle lark,' in which Madame Lancia was accompanied by M. de Jong, her notes blended with the silver notes of the flute, suggesting the idea of a duet between skylarks. This was one of the great treats of the evening. In a song from Tennyson's May Queen Madame Lancia was complimented with an encore, upon which she gave 'Coming thro' the Rye,' with a soiretà and humour which left nothing to be desired. Her performances of Rode's air, with variations, was a wonderful example of executive skill. The instrumental part of the programme comprised a duet between the first violins, beautifully performed; a viola solo, by Herr Bernhardt—greatly admired; overtures, and other concerted pieces. M. de Jong also gave a solo on the flute, which was encored. The wedding March 'of Mendelssohn terminated the concert, which was fashionably attended, and reflects additional credit on the committee, who have so often exerted themselves in securing for the town and neighbourhood the performances of the best artists."

LEEDS.—The following is from a correspondent on the spot:—

"The Leeds Madrigal and Motet Society gave their second concert on Saturday evening. From a variety of causes the first (in January) suffered considerably in regard to attendance, and the committee found themselves involved in considerable pecuniary loss. To remedy this a benefit concert was given, to as large and enthusiastic an audience as ever filled the great room in the Town Hall—more than 1,900 people thus showing their appreciation of this excellent and useful institution. All the vocalists gave their gratuitous services. Mr. George Perren coming from Cambridge on purpose. Never was this excellent tenor in better voice. His rendering of 'My pretty Jane,' 'The Thorn,' and 'The old Green Land,' was perfect, and he was deservedly encored after each. Miss Anna Ayrton, Miss Annie Ayrton, and Mr. Dodda, the other principals, acquitted themselves well. Mr. Ives gratified the audience with a violin solo (Sainton's Rondo Maurika), and had to comply with an encore. The versatile Mr. Macaske being also there giving an entertainment, kindly came to sing (with great effect) 'Tha Whistling Thief' (Lover), and a recitation of 'Thomas O'Brien,' a story of '98. The chorus of the society (200 voices) gave several part songs with their accustomed ability, showing careful training at the hands of their conductor, Dr. Spark. This society is now free from debt, and has no doubt a prosperous career before it."

SHEFFIELD.—A correspondent informs us that the Choral Union have given a performance of the Creation with Miss Anna Hiles, Mr. Robson, and Mr. D. Price as solo vocalists. The Sheffield Daily Telegraph writes as follows:—

"Miss Hiles sang 'With Verdure Clad' like a true artist, and while using her voice to the best advantage seemed intent on interpreting the thoughts of the composers rather than displaying herself. At least she drew down enthusiastic applause—as she did indeed after each effort. Mr. Robson and Mr. Price both acquitted themselves well, as did the chorus and orchestra. Mr. Ilce was principal violin and Mr. Smith conducted."

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—In reference to a paragraph in the Musical World of last week, I beg to say that Mr. J. B. Jewson is the highly esteemed musical Professor at St. Mary's Hall, Brighton. I succeeded Mdlle. Angèlo in the vocal department, which that lady had resigned owing to her public engagements. Would you kindly oblige me by inserting this in your next impression.—Yours truly, MAYENCE.—Herr Oberthur, from London, has been announced to play at the concerts of the Art Association.

MUNICH.—Herr Franz Lachner was the object of a perfect ovation, a short time since, at the Odeon, on the occasion of his conducting his Fourth Suite. The audience manifested unmistakably their sympathy with the old school, in opposition to that so strenuously supported by his Bavarian Majesty. Do what he will, however, King Ludwig will never make his subjects Wagnerites.—Auber's Bronze Horse has been successfully revived at the Theatre Royal. Among the novelties produced last year were: Gluck's Iphigenia (arranged by Herr R. Wagner); Die sieben Raben Rheinberger; Don Rheingold, Herr R. Wagner; and Le Cheval de Bronze, mentioned above. The revivals were: Le Domino Noir; Guido et Genèvra; Le Prophète; Tristan und Isolde; Euryanthe; Le Brasseur de Preston; Le Philtre; Il Barbiere; and Die beiden Füchse.

DEPRESSION.

NO regular concert-goer can have failed to mark the empty seats which, recently, have given a beggarly aspect to our concert-rooms. The matter is a subject, not of partial, but of general complaint. Otherwise there might be grounds for believing that local causes led to the result; that, for example, want of attraction, either in artists or programmes, influence the public to stay away. But the universal falling-off cannot be disputed; especially when the Monday Popular audience,—the steadiest and most reliable in London—shows itself affected. Not more conclusive evidence could be desired, now that even Herr Joachim cannot fill the house as of yore. The great violinist and great artist, who hardly knows what an empty seat means, has, this season, the opportunity of enlarging his knowledge of the phenomenon to an uncommon degree. We may well be asked the signification of all this; and we may well try to answer the question hopefully, because minds given to pessimism have already, perhaps, conjured up a gloomy future. We hear it said that concert-givers have shot ahead of the public in the character of their entertainments; that, yielding to the persistent demands of the press, concert-goers have been dosed with more and better music than they can bear; and that a natural reaction has set in which must run its, probably, lengthy course. Others, again, say, that the affection of the public for good music is more apparent than real; that the majority are attracted not so much by what is done, as by who does it; and that, whenever the supply of fresh artists slackens, people begin to stay at home. To some extent, there is truth in these statements;—just enough truth to make the arguments based on them plausible. But, as explaining the phenomenon of which we speak, they are worthless. No excess of catering, and no lack of novelty could affect audiences as they are now affected, because there are enough amateurs in London, whom these causes cannot touch, to make empty benches at good concerts impossible. Who will venture to say that Mr. Chappell has overdosed his faithful patrons; or that, having Herr Joachim and his fellow-artists, the Monday Popular audience stays away in disgust at the absence of novelty? It is clear that we must look farther after the Why of our scanty gatherings. Suppose we search outside the region of art, and within the region of the pocket.

These are not flourishing times. The assertion is constant and abiding; but, now, it will really bear investigation, as everybody having eyes to see must see. Moreover, any given number of people have only so much money to spend upon music. The article is not one of primary necessity, so long as there are mouths to fill and bodies to clothe A man has first to pay his way; and, although very many do nothing of the sort, the obligation is none the less strong. Having satisfied this condition of living, he may or may not have the means of luxury. At present those means are undeniably scanty. This assertion, if need were, could be backed by the loud and discontented voices of luxury-providers everywhere, who cry their wares in vain to poorly lined pockets. But just now there is a special cause at work, banning all thoughts of luxury, musical or other. Among the obstacles in that "way" which every body must pay, is the tax-gatherer. Like "Pallida Mors," that worthy is inevitable; but he has chosen to come before his time, and at an hour ("Pallida Mors" again) when he is particularly unwelcome. Mr. Lowe is, surely, a most infelicitous man. In order to relieve cab-masters, and other flourishing people, of imposts which they decline to share with the public, he turns on the tax-gatherer as a supplement to our Christmas bills. What wonder that the depleted tax-payer, jingling his few remaining coppers, and ringing a melancholy dirge in the depths of his pocket, makes resolutions of retrenchment. He would cut off the new silk dress for his wife, run his pen through a list of "accomplishments" for his daughters, and refuse to discuss the merits of rival watering places, if he dared. But he remembers the words of the preacher about the advantage, under certain conditions, of a "dinner of herbs" over a stalled ox, and does not dare. Retrenchment goes on, nevertheless, and among the things most promptly sacrificed is music. "Plenty of that at home," says the British tax-payer, before proceeding to recoup himself for Mr. Lowe's demauds, out of the otherwise sure receipts of concert-goers.

Here, then, is the reason for the depression of which we speak. Accepting it, we find it has a bright side. Where the cause is temporary, so must be the result; and, in any case, it is satisfactory to believe that, instead of an indifference to art, the public are influenced by a contracted pocket.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

THE sudden failure of Mr. Reeves's voice at the last Saturday Evening Concert has, of course, led to the usual crop of complaints. "A Grumbler," who, at all events, has the gift of seeing himself as others see him, protests that what Mr. Reeves did sing showed no signs of weakness, and declares his belief that the stoppage was no more than a freak. "A Grumbler" must be a very stupid fellow, or else his satire upon last Saturday's "goose" is very clumsy. We assume the former, and ask our good friend to ask himself, in one of his specially sane moments, whether Mr. Reeves, or any other artist, is likely, for a freak's sake, to sacrifice a large sum of money, and to do so over and over again? It must be very pleasant to feel one's-self a public favourite, but it does not follow that part of the pleasure lies in flinging away cash, and risking the position.

WE are in the habit of calling woman the "weaker vessel," without troubling ourselves as to the truth of the expression. Is there any truth in it? The "weaker vessel" lives longer than we do, endures pain better, climbs Mont Blanc, rides to hounds over the stiffest "bullfinches," makes speeches, and wants to amputate limbs. Moreover, the "weaker vessel" has the faculty of escaping catarrh. Look at our artists just now. The men are down with hoarseness right and left; the women, unassailable from every point of the compass, are blissfully unconscious of having throats, and sometimes do the work of their masculine confrères as well as their own. Clearly, some of our social arrangements must be reversed For example, why should not we bear, if need arise, on a wet night: "Will any lady ride outside to oblige a gentleman?"

IN one of this week's "waifs," our readers will see what they have to expect, next season, in the matter of opéra-bouffe. We are threatened with a Gallic invasion of the most formidable character, and London will resound with the strains of Offenbach and his disciples. Are we sorry for it? Not at all. Let us have as much of the thing as possible, at one time. Politic pastrycooks have been known to give new apprentices the run of the shop for a day or two. Consequences:—inordinate stuffing, sickness, disgust, and avoidance of the sweets for ever after. We, therefore, say again: Let us have all the opéra-bouffe our "lively neighbours" can give us. We shall the sooner grow tired of it, and turn to wholesome pabulum.

HERR RICHARD WAGNER'S Lohengrin has been produced at Brunswick, but with very doubtful success. The partisans of the Prophet lay the blame—of course—on everything and everybody, except the music and its composer. They are loud in their denunciations of the conductor, Herr Abt, the chorus, and the members of the band, none of whom, they say, were perfect.

DESPITE the unfortunate destruction of the Theatre Royal at Dresden, by what penny, or rather, three-half-penny-a-liners term "the devouring element," the opera company gave, during the past year, one hundred and thirty-three operatic performances.—There is a great diversity of opinion regarding the site to be selected for the New Theatre Royal. It is to be hoped, however, that those persons with whom the matter rests, will speedily come to a decision, so that the new building may be commenced without unnecessary delay.

THE damage done by the late fire to the new building of the Association of Music, at Vienna, amounts to from forty to fifty thousand florins.—At a concert given, a short time since, by a fair pianist, Mdlle. Leopoldine Pfuhl, all the gas burners in the room kept growing dimmer and dimmer, until at length they went out altogether. Thinking, no doubt, that the best course under the circumstances, would be to "make light" of her misfortune, Mdlle. Pfuhl went on playing very unconcernedly for about half-an-hour, at the expiration of which period it was found that the gaseous deficiency, if we may so express it, was at an end.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

MISS LILY SIMESTER gave a concert, on Monday evening, at the Horns Assembly Rooms, Kennington, assisted by Misses Poole, Palmer, and Kate Gordon; Messrs. Albert James, José Howe, J. Balsir Chatterton (harp), and Lehmeyer. Miss Poole, who retains her position as a general favourite, obtained the first encore. Miss Lily Simester, in "The Ash Grove" and "Tell me my heart" (accompanied on the harp by Mr. J. B. Chatterton), evoked more than ordinary enthusiasm. The duet, "Over the Hawthorn Hedge," and the trio, "My lady, the Countess" (Misses Poole and Palmer), were rendered in a manner which left nothing to desire. Miss Simester was also very successful in Mr. Benedict's new song, "Little Willie," the sentiment of which was interpreted to perfection. Miss Palmer displayed remarkable power in Hatton's "Rosend;" Miss Kate Gordon's pianoforte solo, "Com è gentil," was well received; Mr. Albert James, in "The Pilgrim of Love," obtained a recall, when he substituted "My pretty Jane." Mr. José Howe, very creditably, and at short notice, filled the place of Mr. Lewis Thomas, kept away by indisposition. In Molloy's "Vagabond" he produced a masterly effect. Mr. J. B. Chatterton's appearance was the signal for hearty applause, which was fully accounted by his performance on the harp. Herr Lehmeyer played a pianoforte solo on Rigoletto, and conducted with ability. Although the weather was unpropitious, there was a tolerably good attendance, and the performances were much enjoyed.

A CONCERT was given on February 2nd, in Victoria Hall, Notting Hill, for the benefit of St. Mark's National Schools' Building Fund. It attracted a crowded audience, and the receipts realised a considerable amount. A portion of the Norfolk House Choir attended, and performed several popular glees and part songs, under the direction of Mr. Lansdowne Cottell, with much effect. A young German vocalist, Madlle. Zarnicki, sang the waltz aria, "The Naiades," and was recalled, as was also Madame D'Elise in a song by Miss Gabriel. Mr. George Taylor sang Duggan's "Why breathe that sigh?" and was encored, as was Mr. C. J. Bostenton in a new song, "Nearer to my soul than art." Miss A. Dwight, Mr. W. Reeves, and Mr. F. Childerstone, contributed some songs and duets. Miss Anny Perry in Holmes's Capricia à la Scozzese created a legitimate effect. The concert was a decided success. Mr. Lansdowne Cottell and Mr. Mansell Ramsey accompanied.

MR. AGUILAR'S RECITALS.—The programme of February 3rd was as follows:—Sonata in B flat, Beethoven; "Cherietana," a dramatic and romantic piece, Aguilar; Andante and Rondo Capriccioso, Mendelssohn; "Last Look" (romance), Aguilar; Polonaise in A, Chopin; "Love Song," Henselt; Sonata in G, Aguilar; Lieder ohne Worte, Mendelssohn; "The Blue Bells of Scotland," Aguilar; Humoreska (morceau caractéristique), Aguilar; "Evening" (romance), Aguilar; "Coulleur de Rose" (galop brillant), Aguilar. Mr. Aguilar was favoured with a large attendance of his friends and pupils.

LINCOLN'S INN CHAPEL.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—Will you allow me to correct a mis-statement which appears in the last impression of the Musical World? The office of Decani, or principal Tenor in the choir of Lincoln's Inn has not been vacant for some years past. Since the retirement of Mr. George Perren, three or four years since, the post has been occupied—I need not say most efficiently—by Mr. William Coates, who still holds the appointment.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

CHARLES STEGGALL, Mus. D. Cantab.,
Organist, &c., to the Honourable Society of February 9th, 1870. Lincoln's Inn.

LAST night the Sacred Harmonic Society were to give Mendelssohn's Lobgesang and Rossini's Stabat Mater—always one of the most attractive of the Society's many attractive programmes.

ALL the world will regret that Mr. Shirley Brooks has been seriously ill; all the world will rejoice that our best modern essayist, and brightest conversational wit, is pronounced by Sir Henry Thompson to be out of danger.

CHRISTINA NILSSON.

The following article, though written several years ago, retains all its original interest, and its reproduction here requires no apology. Mdlle Nilsson is still, and will remain for years to come, an artist respecting whose career every detail may reckon upon a welcome:—

About twenty years ago, the wife of a poor field laborrer, named Nilsson, who resided with his family at Welland, near the little town of Vexio, situated in the Swedish province of Smoeland, gave birth to a female child, whom they forthwith got baptised by the name of Christina. She was their last daughter, and came into the world seven years after the birth of the youngest of her brothers. In her eighth year, she began to attend the public school of Vexio, at the parish church of which place, herfather, who, it appears, was possessed of a fine voice, was accustomed to sing tenor at church festivals and funeral services. The third son of this rustic vocalist had learned, without the aid of any master, to play on the violin, and to become the musician at all the balls of the neighbourhood. When, at the early age of nine, the little Christina was wont to sing, in her sweetest tones, the native melodies of her birthplace, it was this brother who accompanied her on his violin, and when his duty called him to labour in the fields, his sister took up his violin, and, self-taught like her brother, learned to accompany her voice on the self same instrument.

When Christina had reached her twelfth summer, her mother used to take her to the neighbouring fairs, and there the girlish vocalist, meanly dressed, a smile on her lips, her rich golden hair scarcely concealed under her silk kerchief, sang to the delight of gazing readers, who stood round her listening and enchanted and who went, one by one, to throw into her boyish brother's hat the tribute of two half-pence each, their simple remuneration for the pleasure she dispensed them. When the fairs were over she repaired dutifully to her father's homestead, and in his hands she deposited the money she had earned, and thus contributed her share to the sustenance of his poor household.

At the age of thirteen there came the turning point in her humble existence. Her mother had taken her to the fair of Ljungby, and had left her there with her little brother. Here a ventriloquist had raised his booth opposite the very place the youthful Christina had fixed upon for the display of her powers. Here then was a fair rival, against whom all his talents were vain; he saw his customers slide off to the opposite establishment. But he did not despond, but like a practical man of business, as he was, called upon the syren, and engaged her services, in his establishment, at the rate of 20 francs for the eight days of the fair. This, then, was the first contract entered upon by her, who, in a few years, was to be the cherished idol of the Italian Opera. It was that the childish performer was singing, with all the enthusiasm of genius, she attracted the attention of Judge Torneheim, a member of the town bench. who, passing by, stopped, and struck with admiration, exclaimed: "Child! then hast the voice of an angel, there is the ray of genius in thy eye —in thy forehead. Listen—wouldst then like to learn to be a great singer?" "Sir. I cannot," answered the child, with emotion; "I am under an engagement with the ventriloquist. I will break off thy engagement for thee," replied the worthy magistrate, "and will take thee to a lady who will be a mother to thee, and with whom thou wilt learn to sing perfectly." Little Christina Nilsson remained a few moments in thoughtful silence; she reflected that she engaged with the ventriloquist in order to contribute to maintain her parents, if she accepted of the judge's proposal that would deprive them of her aid. The thought weighed on her young heart: her breast heaved, and her beautiful blue eyes filled with tears "Poor child!" exclaimed Mr. Torneheim, "write to thy parents; let them know the proposal I make thee; to-morrow I will return here with the lady to whose mother care I would confide thee. Christina sent a letter to her parents by her brother, who returned with the answer that she was not to return to take leave of them, for then they would not have the courage to part from her. "Tell her," said they, "that we pray God to accompany her and bless her as we do bless her." The Baroness Leuhausen, her future protectrix, presented herself at the ventriloquist's booth. Before her marriage she also had been a celebrated singer. A few words sufficed to settle with the ventriloquist. Two gold pieces reconciled that worthy to rescind the engagement with little Nilsson, and the Baroness took her home with her. After giving her the first lessons in her art she placed her with the celebrated singing master, Franz Berwald, of Stockholm, under whose roof she remained a two-month. After six months teaching, Berwald took her to sing before the Royal Family of Sweden, who were delighted with her performance. In acknowledgment of the applause she received, she performed a solo of great difficulty on the violin, and filled the audience with wonder. Some months afterwards, the Baroness took her to Paris, and placed her in a boarding-school. Here she received lessons from the well-known teacher. Wartel, once a baritone of some celebrity at the Imperial Opera, who, after giving her musical instruction during three years, introduced her to M. Carvalho, the lessee of the Lyrical Theatre, Paris, before whom, and the stage manager she sang the aria of Roberto," the variations of Rhode, and the cavatina of Bertly. The night before, the young artist had dreamed that she had sung before the lessee, and that he had given her an engagement in his theatre. This she mentioned to her singing-master, and he to Carvalho, who, after hearing her, engaged her for three years, at the rate of 2000 francs the first year, 2500 francs the second, and 3000 the third, which will terminate in the month of May, 1867. Nilsson made her début in the Traviata, in which she sang 80 nights in succession; each succeeding night bringing an ovation that exceeded the former one. And thus was the poor singing child of Welland repaid for the dutiful efforts of her earlier years, and nothing was wanting in the hour of her triumph, neither garlands of flowers, nor the bravos of the dilettanti, nor the applause of listening thousands. She appeared 150 nights in the Enchanted Flute, and with equal success 100 nights in Martha, the same number in Don Juan, and lastly in Sardanapalus, an opera composed by a young author of great promise, whom Christina Nilsson took a great pleasure in making known to and applauded by the world. Every day her triumphs are on the increase. The qualities of her voice and her genius are daily developing extraordinary elements, that make public delight, and which are rapidly placing her among the musical glories of her country a country that among others gave birth to the far famed Jenny Lind.

Christina Nilsson is now about 21 years of age, tall and slender, with curly golden hair, broad and intellectual forehead, large blue eyes, sunshine none of delicate contour, fresh, graceful mouth, small white teeth, well set and beautifully formed neck and shoulders, and graceful and flexible shape. Her voice is clear and of great power, full and sustained in the grave notes, and in the high notes wonderfully silvery, pleasing, pure, and melodious. Nothing can be more precise than her performance, nor at the same time more imbued with feeling than her manner of singing. In passages of passion she is inimitable, in those of bravura she is extraordinarily brilliant, and in finales and symphonies her voice dominates all, and seems by its harmonic power to blend all the others into musical beauty.

While on the stage, she is never absent in mind, but always possesses the power of identifying herself with the part she is playing.

Her candour delights you, her energy makes you thrill, her depth of feeling fills you with emotion. In the Traviata, she dies as Mariani, the great tenor, dies in the Lucrezia. In Martha she sings with a tenderness and grace that has never been surpassed, or even equalled. Christina Nilsson was born to be a great tragedian. She is now but in the beginning of her career. She speaks her native language, which is the Swedish, with purity, as also, that of English, German, Italian, and French, and can sing in every one of them. She is now singing in French in the Lyrical Opera of Paris. She will shortly make her debut in Italian at the Italian Opera in London, where she has been engaged, for 1,500 francs a month, for the summer season of 1867 and 1868, in company with Tietjens and Trebelli, the tenor, Gardoni; and the baritone, Santley; and she will return to the Lyrical Theatre of Paris for the months of August, September, October, and November, at a salary three times greater than she enjoys at present.

And now, she who was the poor singing girl of Welland, is sought for by the lessees of the greatest theatres in the world. The child that sang in the ventriloquist's booth for twenty francs for eight days efforts, is now the delight of the Parisian world. She has contributed to sing in London for 1,500 francs a month, and every night she sings in private concerts the melodies of her native land—those melodies for which she was once remunerated with forty or fifty pence by her audience of admiring rustics. she is paid at the rate of 1,000 or 2,000 francs—the great reward of success and application. And yet, in spite of her glory and good fortune, Christina Nilsson still remains modest, good, and humble. The days of her early life are still deeply graven on her memory. When she sees a boy or girl singing or playing on a violin in the street, she invariably gives them money. "I know," she says, "they are beginning the world as I did." She will no doubt, soon acquire a considerable fortune. Her ambition is to purchase a good estate in order to insure the existence of her parents and her own, and then to found a singing school in her native place for poor children. "I shall," she often says, "to pay back to mankind what mankind has done for me."

In the concerts given for the benefit of the poor, she not only contributes from her own purse, but also makes the collection for them herself. Thus, at the last Tuileries Concert for the Benefit of Orphans, after having been immensely applauded, and several times called on the stage, she availed herself of the enthusiasm of the public, and, entering amongst the spectators, purse in hand, she asked alms for the orphans, and then returned to the stage, laden with money, and receiving the honours and applause of the public.

Nor are her virtues less great than her musical genius. The glory of poets is kept up by their books, that of painters and sculptors by their paintings and their sculptures, while that of singers dedicated to theatrical art, can only be kept through admiration by the world, and their memories. Their triumphs, the applause they receive, the ovations of joy or sorrow which they inspire among their listeners in their nights of happy inspiration, and which, it is true, often produce them wealth, last but the period of their lives. They are like flowers that die in their beauty, but yet even those had may be copied with the artist's brush. Of her who enchanted us with song there rests but a remembrance; of her voice, her style, her performance, nothing remains. But the virtues and the good actions of Christina Nilsson will always remain in store, and will secure pure her portrait to remote posterity. The daughter of the poor field labourer of Welland, honours the land that gave her birth, not only by her genius, but by her modesty and charitable disposition. Happy, three happy the women who can write with these characters her name in the book of history.

The Santley tour party, with Mdlle. Sinico, Miss A. Edmonds, Herr Wilhelmj, and Madame Arabella Goddard, have given concerts since our last at Bradford, Newcastle-upon-Tyne(two—morning and evening), Edinburgh, Glasgow, Dundee, and Aberdeen. The last concert of the English part of the tour takes place to-day at Liverpool (morning).

Mr. Balfe is recovering from his attack of bronchitis.

Mr. Jefferson will revisit England next year.

A new drama, The Countess, is in preparation at the Royal Alfred.

Mr. Alfred Baylis, the new tenor, is engaged for the Saturday Evening Concerts at Exeter Hall.

Mr. Byron leaves the Globe Theatre, and goes, it is said, to the Adelphi, where he will play in a piece of his own writing.

Mr. Henry Neville, it is reported, returns to his allegiance at the Adelphi.

The post of organist of the Parish Church, Hackney, is vacant. The stipend is £77 per annum.

Mr. Dussek Corrie, husband to Miss Thirlwall, died lately, after a few days' illness.

The Pope has conferred upon M. Leybach the order of Gregory the Great.

A commission has been appointed to inquire into and re-constitute the Conservatoire at Paris.

Mr. H. J. Byron goes to the Adelphi shortly, in a new play of his own.

M. Felix and his company, with Schneider, will this year appear at the Princess's Theatre.

Professor Sterndale Bennett gave his first lecture on music before the University of Cambridge, last Saturday, in the Art's School.

M. Louis Boisdilon, a nephew of the famous composer of that name, died last month at Paris.

Mr. George B. Allen, Musc. Bac., and Miss Alice May, the contralto singer, sailed on the 14th inst. for Melbourne.

A contemporary says that it is reported that Mr. Barry Sullivan has received from "a noble lady" a cheque for £10,000, to cover his losses at the Holborn Theatre.

Mr. Dion Boucicault will write the libretto of the next opera-bouffe produced at the Lyceum. This work is Le Petit Faust, by Hervé, the composer of Chilpéric.

Mr. Ernest, a new tenor, studying under Signor Salvini, M.D., will sing with Mdlle. Liebhart, Mr. Santley, and Signor Foli, at Chelsea, on the 15th.

Mr. Tom Hohler has accepted an engagement with M. Bagier at the Italiens, and will very shortly make his first appearance in the Salle Ventadour, in Marie.

Le Menestrel says that Signor Mario has engaged himself for three years at St. Petersburgh, in the capacity of Regisseur General. We don't believe a word of the story.

The Italian journals are ecstatic over a Mdlle. Albani, who is now singing at Messina. Unfortunately, we know too well what the ecstacy of Italian journals is worth.

Upon retiring from the post of Director of the Court balls, after twenty-one years' service, M. Strauss has been named Chevalier of the Legion of Honour.

The first of Mr. John Boosey's new series of concerts, under the new title of "Saturday Ballad Concerts," takes place this evening, in St. James's Hall.

M. Pasdeloup's programme of last Sunday ran thus:—Symphony ("Jupiter"), Mozart; unfinished Symphony in B minor, Schubert; "Septet," Beethoven; "Gavotte," Lachner; Overture (Ruy Blas), Mendelssohn.

At a concert given in Paris on Tuesday last, on behalf of the Société Italienne, several unpublished works of Rossini were performed. Among the artists engaged were Mdme. Alboni, Mdme. Battu, MM. Gardoni and Menn.

Referring to some remarks to the effect that Chilpéric, is shortly to be withdrawn from the Lyceum, and replaced by Le Petit Faust, adapted by Mr. Dion Boucicault, the lessees state that they do not intend at present to substitute any other opera-bouffe for Chilpéric.

The Gazzetta Piemontese informs us that the second performance of Signor Vera's new opera, Velaria, was equally as successful as the first. La Signora Vera Lorine and the baritone Coliva had both some effective pieces to sing; a "Bridisi," especially, met with immense success. The scenery and dresses were splendid, and the opera altogether was magnificently put upon the stage. Velaria will shortly be produced at Florence.

The difference in size between the two prima donnas at the Boston (Madame Parepa-Rosa and Miss Rose Hersee) is happily expressed in their names. While one is rose the other is Rosa."—Boston (U.S.) Saturday Gazette, Jan. 15.

MADAME PATTI.—The Emperor Alexander has just conferred on Madame Patti the Order of Merit, and appointed her first singer at the Court. The decoration is set with diamonds and surmounted with the Imperial crown.

At Mr. George Wood's Saturday Evening Concert, to-night (Exeter Hall), the features of the programme are Mr. Macfarren's cantata, May Day, originally produced at the Bradford Festival, many years ago, and Beethoven's C minor symphony.

M. Pasdeloup was faithful to his colours even till the last moment. He closed his directorship of the Lyrique with Wagner's Rienzi. We don't like Wagner, yet we say,—"Well done, M. Pasdeloup." Constancy, even to a bad cause, must command respect.

The Milan Fama announces that Prince Poniatowski has three operas in hand:—one for Paris, libretto by Saint-Georges; another for the Théâtre Grec, libretto by Dumas; and another founded on Tasso's Aminta, for Mdme. Patti.

Amongst the engagements made by Mr. Montague for the new theatre in the Strand, are those of Miss Nelly Power and Mr. Henry Irving. There is a chance of Miss Lydia Foote's joining Mr. Montague's company.

At the Saturday Popular Concert of to-day, Beethoven's septet is to be repeated. The quartet is Mozart's, in G minor, with pianoforte. Pianoforte, Miss Zimmermann, who is also to play her own arrangement of one of Handel's organ concertos (a very unusual, and, we may add, a very questionable, feature in the Popular Concert programme).

Mr. Sothern is recovering from his late accident. Ladies will be delighted to hear that, before cannoning against the tree, he had the presence of mind to turn his head, and thus save the symmetry of his nose. He will re-appear as Dundreary on the 14th inst., and his first original part will be in a two-act drama by Mr. Craven.

Mr. T. W. Robertson is said to be out of health. A gentleman who waited so long for success, and who, when it came, bore it so modestly, is sure to command the sympathy of the public. By the way, in his Nightingale, Mr. Robertson has the credit of being the first who has ventured to amuse a British audience by "guying" a clergyman.

An effort is being made in Belgium to revive the Flemish school of music, of which Crequillon, Arcadelt, Ockeghem, and Lassus are the chief ornaments. M. Edouard Gregoire heads the enterprise, and his work, Réflexions sur la régénération de l'ancienne école de musique flamande et sur le théâtre flamand is attracting much attention.

So much ingenuity is shown in the offerings made to artists that we are half inclined to think the artists themselves devote their spare time to the subject. At Nice, recently, a bouquet was tendered to an actress, having concealed within it a jewelled nightingale, enclosed in a golden cage. The recipient is said not to have discovered her prize for some time, which saying who will may believe.

L'Europe Artiste says that London will have enough of operetta during May and June. M. Felix comes with Schneider; M. Moreau Sainti with Les Turcs; M. Bertrand with Les Bruyands, and, perhaps, Mdlle. Irma with La Princesse de Trébizonde. Seeing that we already have M. Hervé with Chilpéric, if London be not content, London is very ungrateful.

The symphony at the Crystal Palace Concert, to-day, is Spohr's in G major (the "Historical"). The overtures are Mozart's Idomeneo, and the Ferrabras of Schubert. Mr. Carrodus is to play the first movement (why not the whole?) of Beethoven's violin concerto. Mdlle. Carola and Signor Foli are the singers. A strong programme, indeed.

Miss Kathleen Ryan, youngest daughter of the late Desmond Ryan, made a successful "first appearance" at the Theatre Royal, Haymarket, as Charlotte, in How to Die for Love. Miss Ryan has many requisites for the stage, and further practice, combined with her natural qualifications, will, there is every reason to believe, make her a genuine actress; nothing could have been kinder than her reception by the public.

"The inauguration concert of the Sala Sivori at Genoa," says the Opinione, "was a splendid success. Sivori, as usual, astonished us by his marvellous playing. Signor Luca Fumagalli, came from Milan expressly for the concert, and in a sonata of Beethoven, a concerto of Weber, and a concerto on La Sonnambula, composed by his brother, the late Adolfe Fumagalli, showed himself to be a pianist of the first order."

Herr Oberthür, the harpist, is on a Continental tour, and has met with invariable success in the towns he has visited, commencing with Calais, where he played his Médiation and Cascade, as well as two fantasias by Parish Alvars. Recalled after each piece, he was forced to play the last one over again. At Lille, Herr Oberthür, gave his Souvenir de Londres, Les Huguenots, and Cascade, and was recalled after each. From Lille he goes to Cologne, and thence to Mayence, when he will play a duet, for harp and piano, with Madame Schott, wife of the Burgomaster and well-known music publisher of that town.

At the Operahouse at Lima, the prima donna, Signora Marchetti, has had her benefit. Her admirers decorated the whole way from her residence to the theatre with flowers, ribands, and triumphal arches, and drew her back home in a car got up for the occasion; but her partisans, and those of Signora Mollo, refusing to hear the rival singer, threw stones and brickbats on the stage. As the chorus-singers were maimed, it is supposed the authorities may interfere. Meanwhile, a third prima donna has arrived from Panama, a Miss Stiles, an American of promise.

Those who hope for the establishment of an opera-bouffe in London must not be discouraged after seeing Chilpéric. It is dull, but it must be borne in mind that, probably not within a lifetime will one be called on to listen to such music as the English admiration, with its jokes about "Who's Griffiths?" and stolen Joe Millerisms. However, those who really appreciate genuine fun, will be delighted with a Mr. Odell, who plays the Chamberlain. The red on the tip of this gentleman's nose, his occasional falsetto voice, and the real humour which prompts him to fall down every five minutes, to appear now with a dust-pan in his hand, now with a broom, give hopes that we have at last found a worthy successor to—well, say Harry Boleno!

MUSICAL EVENINGS.—The first of a series of musical evenings for the performance of chamber music, under the directorship of Mr. Henry Holmes, was given on Tuesday night at St. George's Hall. The programme comprised the quartet in A (No. 5) for two violins, viola, and violoncello, by Beethoven, Handel's Suite de pièces, and a quartet in E flat, Op. 44, by Mendelssohn, besides some classical songs and other instrumental pieces, with Mr. Henry Holmes for the first violin, Mr. W. Macfarren for pianist, and Miss Marion Severn for vocalist. The performance, as might have been anticipated, was successful, and the programme was just sufficiently long to be duly without tiring. The next concert will take place on the 1st of March.

On Tuesday week a morning performance took place at the Gaiety, which was really entertaining. But then the Sock and Buskin people had just an inkling of stage art, for they were members of the new Dramatic Training School, under the management of some of the company at the Gaiety Theatre. The connection of the new school with the Gaiety is very creditable to the theatre, and may in time lead up to a good "house of call" for actors and actresses, who need not parade themselves and the public by bursting upon the world too precipitately. The performance consisted of All that Glitters is not Gold, and the Waterman, which involved promising acting and singing, together with a wondrous military solo on the drum, not, perhaps, quite so telling as Thackeray's "Chronicle." Of course we forbear to give names.

THE MOHAWK MINSTRELS.—If "he who drives fat oxen should himself be fat," who sells music should himself be musical. The condition appears to be satisfied in some degree, at least, for certain assistants in the West-end music shops have formed themselves into a troupe, under the style and title of Mohawk Minstrels. Why "Mohawk Minstrels" we cannot tell, nor does it much matter. The designation is alliterative, and any troupe, by any name, would sing just as well or as badly. The Mohawk Minstrels made their début on Saturday last at the Concert Hall, Store Street, with great success. Their programme was varied enough to suit all tastes. It contained songs, both comic and sentimental, instrumental solos, dances, sketches, stump speeches, and the inevitable "shekaddik" walk round. We cannot go into particulars about the performance, nor is it necessary. Everything was well received by a crowded audience, and encores were the order of the evening. Among those who specially distinguished themselves were Mr. Harry Guest, Mr. Chandler, Mr. Dean Edwards, and Mr. J. Francis, who, besides acting as stage manager, made a stump speech, joined in a "comic sketch," and sang several comic songs. The Mohawk Minstrels may congratulate themselves.

We read the following in Watson's Art Journal of the 22nd ult:—

"Next week Mrs. Howard Paul assumes her celebrated rôle of the Grand Duchess at the Théâtre Français. It is said that her success in this character was so great in London that the piece ran over one hundred nights. The great Schneider wrote the following letter after witnessing her creation of the Duchess in London:—'Chère Ami—Last night I assisted at the first performance of La Grande Duchesse, and I confess I was most curious to see how my capricious little Duchess would deport herself in an English garb. I was enchanted with your personation; and your treatment of the 'Song of the Glass' was so original and piquante, that I could fully comprehend the endless encores it received. The Grand Duchess of Paris salutes her English sister. Toute à vous de cœur,—HORTENSE SCHNEIDER. St. James's Theatre, July 12, 1868.'"

Messrs. Asher have lately received from their house at Leipsic a splendid work on the Costumes of all Nations, from the beginning of history to the 19th century, by A. Kretschmer, costumier to the Theatre Royal, Berlin, and Dr. C. Rohrbach, Gotha. This work is illustrated with 100 coloured plates, containing more than 2,000 figures of costumes, implements, furniture, ornaments, &c., &c., of all countries and of all periods. The work suggests itself at once as being invaluable to historians, artists, managers of theatres, and amateurs. The book begins with a history on the origin of costume, fashions, &c., and is divided into antiquities, middle ages, and modern times; and in these divisions every civilized country on the face of the globe receives due attention. Managers of theatres need no longer be at fault in "mounting" a play or an opera; with such a book, artist scarcely need drapery or costumes as models.

Miss Rose Hersee has been making a sensation in Benedict's variations on "Le Carnaval de Venise," at St. Louis, Louisville, Buffalo, &c. Speaking of the performance of Pra Diavolo, by the Parepa Rosa Opera Company, the St. Louis Times (Dec. 9) says:—"Miss Rose Hersee makes an admirable Zerlina, and, while confirming, both in vocal and dramatic ability, all that we have said of her, evinces even more talent than we suspected. Petite in figure, sprightly in action, possessed of a fine voice, and musical voice, she enacts this rôle in a manner difficult to surpass. The chamber scene was marked by many excellencies, among which was an interpretation of the 'Carnival of Venice,' adapted with variations by Benedict. It is a very brilliant composition, requiring high culture of voice, and also a very extended compass. There are several notes which would tax the majority of sopranos to their utmost to reach, but the charming prima donna in question takes them as easily and sweetly as a bird. Her upper notes are wonderfully pure and true, and the song is calculated to win more favour, and in it she achieved a genuine triumph. Applause followed at every rest, and at the conclusion she was called back, and obliged to repeat one or two of the closing variations and the finale."

A performance, by the National Choral Society, of one of Mendelssohn's three Latin motets for female voices deserves notice. Why have all three not been heard time and again? They are masterly and they are charming—in brief, they are Mendelssohn's; yet the public know nothing about them save what is told in the composer's letters. The information thus afforded is interesting enough. When the composer visited Rome in 1830, he fell in love with more than one lady. His passion, however, was of a sort which admitted of a plurality of objects. There was no question of marriage, for the charmers were nuns, whom, moreover, he never spoke, and whom he never even saw. But the nuns of Trinità de' Monti sang with the "sweetest voices in the world, quite tender and touching;" and their tones went straight to the heart of the susceptible young German. How could he resist them? Thanks to some wretched musician there was no need. "The composition is positively ridiculous," said Mendelssohn, alluding to what was sung; "I am composing something to suit their voices, and I mean to send it them." The intention was fulfilled, and the Latin motets came into existence. So, then, these works are bound up with a pretty little bit of romance, which ought long ago to have gained attention for them, even if their intrinsic merit were not what it is, Mr. Martin has done well to bring one before the public. The others await their turn.—Graphic.

Do we any one ever reckon the waste of mental and corporeal energy which is represented by the superfluous noise of a great town? To listen to the distant hum of London in the dusk of the evening, in some spot not liable to any acute sounds, is as suggestive and as mysterious as trying to fathom and analyze the murmurs resounding in a sea-born shell; and if we may believe the learned ones, this arises from the same cause—the collection and intermingling of many faintly-heard echoes. But to hear those same sounds from the noisy midst, to have each clamouring more violently than its fellow for entrance into our brain, how much labour does it not involve upon that easily-tired organ, to which it ought not to be liable? Railways, with their whistles, their fog-signals, their grinding of iron on iron, their constant shocks, the banging of doors, the hoarse, unintelligible screaming of porters, are becoming more and more part of the hourly life of a Londoner. Besides these, our streets have, since Hogarth's day, become far noisier; first Macadamized roads, and now granite, worn down with ever-beating crowds of vehicles of all weights, going at all kinds of paces. These drown the minor abominations of organ-grinders and street bands, that would otherwise have made the world a we are reading or writing waits before us, or would connect our most serious thoughts with that most dreary of all inventions, a comic song. Surely we may welcome anything that will mitigate the torture our nerves undergo from these causes, and not the less when we consider that whatever diminishes noise lessens friction. If the new tramways, of which we are about to have an instalment, effect something in this way, we shall hail them as steps towards a return to peace.—Graphic.

"THE BAKEHOUSE."

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—Faint, sick, and weary, weak in body, and confused in mind, with aching head and trembling hand, I appeal to you to help a miserable musician. For seven long hours last night have I toiled in "the bakehouse," or in words more intelligible to the uninitiated, I have just finished playing at a ball at Willis's Rooms, the orchestra in which is so named by musicians. This orchestra is a small gallery, at about twelve feet from the ball-room, from which it is entered by a small flight of stairs and trap-door. Immediately in front of the orchestra, and nearly on the same level, at only a few feet distance, is an immense gas chandelier, the cause of all my misery. Even before the ball began, on entering the orchestra, I was seized by this "bakehouse," who attacked me with his burning and pestiferous breath. Half suffocated, I commenced playing; soon after experienced the luxury of a Turkish bath, plus evening dress, and when at last the welcome "God save the Queen" had been played, I staggered away half-dead from the effect of my night's work. For many years I and others have endured this, many, alas, I fear, having had their constitutions seriously impaired in consequence.

Who will help us? Will the sanitary inspector do so? Will some of those fair ladies, to whose pleasure we contribute, help us, for little do they think that that ball-room contains a Black Hole, the groans from the miserable victims in which sound only to them as sweet music?

And lastly, will you help us by kindly inserting this letter? If so, you will earn the gratitude of every QUADRILLE BAND.

"Does anyone require a new Quadrille? Let him straightway become the purchaser of either of both the above, which are, without any exception, the most stylish, the most dashing, and the prettiest we know. We cannot choose between them; one is as good as another—another as good as one."—The Queen.

OFFENBACH'S SIX NEW SONGS, published this day with English words, price 3s. each. Extract from review in The Queen, October 23rd:—

"Mr. Keeney has skilfully and tastefully adapted original words to these truly characteristic songs, so that the lovers of Offenbach may enjoy any one of them in the first drawing-room in the land, without fear of offence to the most fastidious. We have said the music is characteristic, and that it is without doubt; but it is something more—it is both fresh and genial, and for flight, supereminently music, we know of nothing prettier.

"No. 1. LOVE AND POETRY, is a graceful song for a mezzo-soprano in E flat, in a sentimental style.

"No. 2. SOME OTHER DAY, is a gay and sparkling bolero in A flat for soprano, F the highest note.

"No. 3. OUTWARD BOUND, is simple to a degree, but withal charming; in melody and accompaniment alike betraying good taste.

"No. 4. SEE YONDER BLOOMING ROSE, another song of the sentimental order, is for soprano; highest note G, and very elegant.

"No. 5. GENTLY GLIDES OUR SKIFF, a barcarole in F, the gem of the series, and the original a barcarole as we last call to mind. The song is perhaps best suited for a tenor; it is excellently vocal, and abounds in novel and piquant effects. If M. Offenbach had written nothing but this barcarole, we should still say that he is a very clever and original musician.

"No. 6. CUPID AND HYMEN, though less attractive than the other numbers, is not without merit, and will possibly please many, more than would better music."

A Comedy in Five Acts.

Being an English version* of MM. Meilhac and Halévy's Froufrou written by H. Sutherland Edwards.

ACT III.

Same Scene as in Act II. Isabel discovered. Enter a Servant.

Isabel. Is there no answer from Lord Walsingham?

Servant. Not yet, ma'am.

Isabel. Very well. (Exit Servant.) What can he say? To such a letter one reply alone is possible. He will say that he obeys me, and that he will go away.

Enter Lady Lorimer.

Lady L. Good morning, Isabel. Do you want to go out for a walk?

Isabel. No, thank you. I must stay at home. I am waiting for an answer to a letter.

Lady L. You are very serious to-day. Let me look at you. There is something in that little forehead, Isabel, that I don't like. You are a great deal too serious.

Isabel. That, surely, ought not to alarm you.

Lady L. It is a very bad sign. I don't like to see people looking too serious who are not used to it. And the worst of it is, that in your case it is not very difficult to guess the cause.

Isabel. Oh, you are quite wrong.

Lady L. I am wrong?

Isabel. Yes, I assure you.

Lady L. So much the better if I am really wrong; and if a certain young nobleman of our acquaintance—if Lord Walsingham, in fact, has nothing to do with it.

Isabel. Lord Walsingham!

Lady L. No? Really?

Isabel. Well, yes. I was thinking of him.

Lady L. Come, Isabel, come.

Isabel. I was thinking of him; but you are very much mistaken if you imagine there is anything to fear. In a minute or two, I dare say, I shall be able to prove what I say. (Enter Servant, bearing a letter.) Is that the answer?

Servant. Yes, ma'am.

Isabel. Ah! (Exit Servant. Isabel, after reading the letter, hands it to the Baroness.) Look here.

Lady L. (reading). "You order me to leave London; I will leave this evening."

Isabel. You see now!

Lady L. Yes, I see—I see that the evil was much greater than I had supposed. For him to send you such an answer, you must have written him a letter——

Isabel. A letter, in which I ordered him to go away, naturally.

Lady L. In which you ordered him to go away. Oh, you had got as far as that. Come, Isabel, come. You remember how much it amused me at first during those rehearsals which took place—let me see—two months ago. As long as I thought it was all in fun, simply an agreeable manner of passing the time, it did not matter. How could I possibly suppose?—— I thought I had to deal with a reasonable woman—with a woman like myself. And if it were ever proposed to me seriously that I should care for any one but Sir John, why it would be just as if, after receiving fifty blows from duty, it were proposed to me that I should receive fifty more by way of pleasure. Those are my principles. Who could ever have imagined that they were not yours? Who could ever have imagined that this Lord Walsingham, this agreeable but flighty young man, would take it into his head to inspire a true sentiment, and become—— I will not say dangerous?

Isabel (smiling). You might.

Lady L. No, I do not, I will not say such a thing.

Isabel. Yes, dangerous—decidedly dangerous; and I am almost grateful to him for it, for I must confess that the consciousness of the danger I was running, is the first serious idea that ever entered my head. When it was once there it is true that several others followed it.

Lady L. Oh, but you must take care.

Isabel. A number of things, to which I paid no attention at the time, presented themselves again to me, and showed themselves in their true light. For instance, when I told you that Louisa was coming here, to stay with us. Do you remember what you said?

Lady L. I don't think I said anything, did I? What could I have said?

Isabel. You said, "Ah!"

Lady L. Nothing more than that?

Isabel. Nothing more. Well, after Louisa had been here some time, I perceived that, on the whole, it is not quite so agreeable as I had at first expected. When I saw that, gradually, and, no doubt, in spite of herself, she was taking my place by the side of my child—by the side of my husband, I found certain ideas arising in my mind, of which it is better, perhaps, that I should not speak. I remembered your "Ah!" and I understood what it meant.

Lady L. Yes; but perhaps you saw too much.

Isabel. I saw what there was to be seen—nothing more. You had guessed at once what would take place, but perhaps you had not guessed of what I should be capable on my side, and that, to put an end to it all, I should take a very decided course.

Lady L. A decided course?

Isabel. Yes, indeed.

Lady L. And in what way? I tremble now at every word you utter.

Isabel. There is a place in the house which belongs to me, and I have made up my mind to occupy it. I have made up my mind to live quite differently from the way in which I have lived hitherto. (Lady L., protests by a gesture.) You do not believe me?

Lady L. Yes, yes.

Isabel. Whether you believe me or disbelieve me, I am decided all the same.

Lady L. Now, don't be rash, Isabel. Come with me for a drive in the park. Then we will call on Mrs. Foljambe; it is her afternoon, and she will have some amusing people with her. You shall dine with me, and to-night we will go to the opera, and after the opera there is Lady Skimpole's ball. To-morrow morning, I will take you to Epsom Races, which will be something quite new to you, and to me also; and we will go on in this style, only faster and faster, until you have recovered your reason. The carriage you were travelling in has run away with you—you are afraid, and want to jump out—you will kill yourself. You will seize hold of your husband, you may tell me, but, poor man, you will only pull him down with you. Don't jump—whip the horses, on the contrary, and go on faster than ever. That, you may depend upon it, is your only way out of the danger. Now, put on your bonnet, and let us go to the park. You must put yourself under my guidance and protection for the next two or three days.

Isabel. No; I will stay at home.

Lady L. Then you are wrong. Good-bye, my dear.

Isabel. Good-bye.

Lady L. Isabel, I beg of you; you will not follow my first advice, which was worth taking—now listen to this: If I were in your place, I should remain shut up, at home, for forty-eight hours at least; and during those forty-eight hours I should think of nothing—I should do nothing. I can assure you that you frighten me, and that you are not in a state just now——

Isabel. What are you saying? I never was more calm—more composed.

Lady L. Oh, good-bye, then—good-bye. (Exit Lady Lorimer.

(Isabel rings the bell.) Enter Susan, L.

Susan. You rang, ma'am?

Isabel. Has Mr. Vivian gone out?

Susan. I don't think so.

Isabel. Tell him I wish to speak to him. (Exit Susan, R.

Susan. Yes, ma'am.

Isabel (looking at Walsingham's letter). Poor fellow! Lady Lorimer was quite right—who could have thought that he would ever be seriously in love?—for he loves me, and he leaves me when I ask him to do so. I am pleased with him, and pleased with myself also. (She tears the letter up into little pieces, and throws them into the fire.) It is all over; the only thing now is to find out whether my dear sister will be kind enough to give me up the place that belongs to me.

Enter Louisa, L.

Louisa (she is in walking dress, and is putting her gloves on). Good-bye, Isabel.

Isabel. Are you going out?

Enter Vivian.

Vivian. You want to speak to me, my dear?

Isabel. Yes, my love. (To Louisa.) Where are you going?

Louisa. To Mrs. Foljambe's; I promised to call upon her to-day, about the governess we are engaging for George.

Isabel (a side). We are engaging. (Aloud.) I can call upon her myself.

Vivian. If you call upon Mrs. Foljambe, I know, before-hand, what will take place. You will invent some new style of dress, between you; but, as for the governess, you will forget all about her. Let Louisa attend to it.

Isabel. Well, let her.

Louisa (to Vivian). And don't you forget that at three o'clock you are to go out and see about that house we think of buying.

Vivian (smiling). I will not forget, Miss Boyston, I will not forget.

Isabel (aside). We think of buying.

Louisa. Is that all? (Kissing her sister.) Good-bys, Isabel.

Isabel (aside, without returning her sister's embrace). Good-bye.

(Exit Louisa at back.

Vivian (who speaks in a fatherly—rather too fatherly a tone throughout this scene). Well! (He sits down, and motions to her to sit down also.)

Isabel. Well, I was going to say——

Vivian. It appears it is not very easy to say it.

Isabel. No, not at all easy. It is a sort of confession I have to make.

Vivian. A confession!

Isabel. Yes, I have something to reproach myself with.

Vivian (smiling). Ah! In debt, Isabel?

Isabel (emphatically). No, nothing of the kind.

Vivian. What then can you have to reproach yourself with?

Isabel. Cannot you guess? Of having been a little frivolous; of having shown a little levity even after our marriage, even after the birth of George—of having remained, in fact, what I was when you first knew me instead of becoming——

Vivian. Is that all? You almost frightened me at first.

Isabel. Oh! and now?

Vivian. Now I am re-assured. You re-assure yourself also, for all this is not very grave.

Isabel. Not very grave?

Vivian. Not grave at all.

Isabel. But, sometime since you used not to speak to me in this way. (Smiling.) I make a mistake. You did not like to speak. But in the absence of words the expression of your countenance, your silence even seemed to say the contrary of what you are saying now. My mode of life, in which you see nothing grave now, used to trouble you then, and as far as your unwillingness to displease me allowed you to do so, you endeavoured to inform me of it.

Vivian. Yes; that was two months ago, but during the last two months——

Isabel. During the last two months——

Vivian. Yes, since Louisa has been here——

Isabel. Louisa!

Vivian. All that has changed.

Isabel (interrupting him). And these things that my sister attends to. If I were to attend to them myself?

Vivian. What an idea, now that everything is going so perfectly.

Isabel. Oh, you think that everything is going on perfectly?

Vivian. Certainly. Just look around you, my dear Isabel, and tell me if any household was ever better conducted than yours has been since Louisa has had charge of it? See how she attends to George, and how well she brings him up. Don't you think I look much better, too, myself since Louisa has been here?

Isabel. If, however, I wanted—if I were absolutely determined to take the direction of affairs?

Vivian. Such zeal would certainly seem to me too laudable not to be encouraged, and I should encourage it with all my might. But——

Isabel. But?

Vivian. But, if in spite of your resolution and of my encouragement, this noble ardour did not continue; if, at the end of a week or of a fortnight, you experienced some lassitude, do not think yourself obliged to struggle, but return at once to your pleasures and your conquests. I assure you that neither the expression of my face nor my silence will reproach you any more. Why should I trouble you, now that it has become useless for me to do so. No, I will not spoil my own happiness; and I will content myself with being the husband of the nicest, the most charming, the most admired, the most adored little woman in the world. (A pause.)

Isabel (getting up). What has become of that post which was offered to you, and which you refused on my account?

Vivian. Carlsruhe?

Isabel. Yes. Could you not go there now? I would accompany you there or anywhere else.

Vivian. No, I could not go there now. My wife might have taken offence at my refusal; on the contrary, they treated me with every kindness. The place they have given me here is almost as good as the mission at Carlsruhe. All's well that ends well, and you really have not so much to reproach yourself with as you think.

Isabel (looks at her husband in a strange manner, and sits down in another part of the room). What I see clearest of all is that all my fine projects——

Vivian (rising). Oh, I quite appreciate them.

Isabel. Indeed?

Vivian. And I wish to reward you for them. The pair of horses which pleased you so much, and which, to say the truth, I thought too dear, shall be yours to-day.

Isabel (rising). I don't want them.

Vivian (astonished). You don't want them?

(Royston appears at the back, showing his head through the half-open door.)

Royston. How do you do, darling?

Vivian. Mr. Royston——

Royston. How are you?

Vivian. You come just in time. Isabel is a little nervous to-day. I fancy, but you will soon be able to put her in good humour.

Royston (to Isabel). A little nervous, are you?

Isabel. How do you do, papa?

Royston. It will soon pass off. I want you to do me a great service, darling. It seems that three days ago you were seen riding in the park in a new sort of hat.

Isabel. Well!

Royston. Mrs. Danvers—you see, I tell you the name, that you may not fancy anything—is dying of anxiety to get one like it. She spoke to me about it, and I thought that to me, your father, you would not refuse.

(Isabel rings the bell.) Indeed, you are going to——

Isabel. I'll tell Susan to bring it to you.

Royston. You are a good girl!

Enter Susan.

(Isabel speaks to her aside.)

Royston (leading Vivian to a corner of the room). Well, did you hear of it? They hissed her; indeed that is why I came back a month sooner than I had intended. Yes, they hissed her.

Vivian. Hissed her—hissed whom?

Royston. Antonia, the dancer, whose début I had promised to witness at Prague. It was a cabal, my dear fellow—a pure cabal. If you hear anything about it, you can boldly maintain that it was a cabal.

Vivian. I will not fail to do so.

Royston. Thanks.

(In the meanwhile Susan has left the room, and Isabel has taken a seat on the sofa.)

Vivian (to Royston, after looking at his watch). I will leave you now with Isabel, and I hope you will not leave her until she has recovered her spirits. I don't know what is the matter with her to-day.

Royston. Leave that to me. (He goes towards the fire-place and arranges his hair before the glass.)

Vivian (to Isabel). Really, now—about that pair of horses?

Isabel. No, no; how many times must I tell you?

Vivian. You decidedly won't have them? Well, once at least, I will show some determination. Whether you want them or not, Isabel, you shall have them.

Royston (replying to some words whispered to him by Vivian as he goes out). Well, give her four. [Exit Vivian.

Isabel (aside). When I wish to return to him to be his wife; that is how——

Royston (going to the piano). He is a very nice fellow, your husband.

Isabel (aside). After all he is right. Since Louisa is here it is quite useless that I—— He treats me like a child.

Royston (strumming on the piano). A very nice fellow indeed.

Isabel (unable to contain herself any longer, and bursting into tears). Ah!

Royston (rising from the piano in a state of astonishment). What! crying, Isabel? What is the meaning of this? What is the meaning of this?

Isabel. Nothing, papa, nothing.

Royston. Come, what is it? Nothing serious, I am sure. But even if it were serious, am I not here; I, your father?

Isabel. Oh!

Royston. What do you mean by "oh?" You mustn't say "oh" like that. I know that now and then I may have seemed a little (gesture), and then this confounded hair; but, hang it, that does not prevent me from being a father. (Enter Susan with the hat.) And as a father——

Susan. Is that it, ma'am?

Isabel. What is it? Oh yes, that is it. (She takes the hat and gives it to her father.) There, that is what you asked me for. [Exit Susan.

Royston (holding the hat, and in a very embarrassed manner). As a father—yes, that is it, thank you. (Resuming his serious air). As a father——

Isabel. Well, what is the matter? Is not that what you wanted?

Royston. Yes, but——

Isabel (smiling in spite of herself). But?

Royston (making up his mind). But there is no question of that now (giving the hat to Susan). Put it in the carriage, please.

Royston. The deuce take it. It shan't be said that once in my life I did not behave like a father. Come here, darling, and tell me plainly why you were crying just now.

Isabel (getting up). For nothing, papa.

Royston. For nothing?

Isabel. You know that one does not always feel——

Royston. Yes, I know, there are moments when I myself—not often—but in spite of all that, there is one thing serious, darling, and that is the affection I have for you. You don't doubt it, I hope; and if you wanted guidance or support, you would not hesitate, would you? Nothing, really? Then what are these tears? A little nervous attack, wasn't it? I was certain of it. Then we need not think anything more about it. Don't let us think any more about it. Give me a kiss, and now——

Digitized by Google

Isabel. Now?

Royston. I want to speak to you about Louisa. I may as well attend a little to her affairs, also, while I am about it.

Isabel. Louisa?

Royston (sitting down). Mr. Graham comes here very often does he not?

Isabel. Mr. Graham?

Royston. Yes.

Isabel. He comes rather often.

Royston. Very often?

Isabel (smiling). Well, if you prefer it——

Royston. And has it led you to suppose nothing?

Isabel. What was I to suppose? That he did me the honour to think I was nice looking?

Royston (laughing). And that he was in love with you? Oh! I don't blame you for it; I thought so myself. (Rising.) It is a habit I have got into and I can't get rid of it. As soon as I hear that a man is paying attention to one of my daughters I say at once: it must be Isabel.

Isabel. Well?

Royston. Well, I am wrong. It's not like a good father. For, after all, I have two daughters, and it is my duty to suppose that from time to time—and that is just what has happened now. Graham called upon me this morning. It is not to see you that he comes here every day; it is to see Louisa.

Isabel (with joy). Louisa!

Royston (sitting down on the sofa). Yes, he is in love with her, and he came to ask my permission to make her an offer.

Isabel (sitting down as his knee). Oh! my dear papa! Oh, how delighted I am—you cannot tell how pleased. Mr. Graham? I don't see how she can possibly refuse him.

Royston. Oh. I don't think she will. A man of good family, handsome fortune——

Isabel. An excellent match in all respects. Mr. Graham is a charming man. She can't possibly refuse him. Have you said anything to Louisa about it?

Royston. Not yet. I should have spoken to her if she had been here, and once more she would probably have given the answer she has always given when spoken to on such a subject: that she does not wish to get married.

Isabel (getting up). She must not give that answer now!

Royston. Well, certainly she ought not to; but she is a strange girl, your sister,—don't you think so? That horror of society, that inexplicable resolution never to get married. She was not like that formerly.

Isabel. No, indeed!

Royston. Shall I tell you what I have often thought about it. Louisa must have been in love with some one.

Isabel (with much emotion). Ah!

Royston. Louisa must have looked forward to a happiness, which suddenly, in a manner we know nothing about, escaped her.

Isabel. Papa!

Royston (rising suddenly, after looking at his watch). Consider all that, reflect, and think for yourself whether what I say does not seem very probable. (He goes to the mantelpiece, takes up his hat, and arranges his hair before the glass).

Isabel (following him). Indeed, papa, indeed!

Royston. Well, you understand, that I, as her father, cannot, but that you, as her sister, might perfectly well. Between women, between sisters, such things may be spoken of. You ought to speak to her, and ask her quietly all about it.

Isabel. I?

Royston. Yes; you ought to try and discover this important secret.

Isabel. I! You wish me to speak to her?

Royston. Say to her what you were saying to me just now, that Graham is a charming man, and she ought really to accept him.

Isabel (resolutely). Oh, as for that——

Royston. You will tell her——(they come forward).

Isabel. Yes. I will tell her.

Royston. You will do all you can to make her accept him.

Isabel. Yes, all I can. And I will make her accept him.

Royston. I think so.

Isabel. I hope so.

Royston. Then, now, you are both of you settled. Since you take the affair in hand, I need have nothing more to do with it. Now, you are laughing again. (Isabel makes a gesture of protest.) Don't deny it, you were laughing. Oh, I am not annoyed. It delights my heart to see you laugh. When I see you crying, however, as you were just now—oh, then I feel——You must not be unhappy, Isabel—you really must not. You will understand why. I do not deceive myself. I know very well that, as a father, I am not perhaps sufficiently—still, as long as you are happy, my conduct is only—light; whereas, if you should take it into your head to be unhappy, very seriously, remember—if you should take it into your head to be unhappy, my conduct would be abominable. But you won't; you love me too much; you will be happy.—if not for your own sake, you will for your father's. (Kissing her.) You will, won't you? You promise me? You are a good little girl. Good-bye, and don't forget to tell your sister as soon as she comes in. Oh, and the hat; what did I do with the hat? Oh, I forget, it's in the carriage.

[Exit Royston.

Isabel. She will not refuse this time. She can't refuse. But if she did? No, it is impossible. But why at the very moment when I say that she cannot, does the idea occur to me? Gracious heaven! who is to defend me when neither my husband nor my father—Oh, my child! I must not forget my child, and by his side, at least, I may hope. (Enter a servant.) Who can have come now?

Servant. Lord Walsingham. His lordship asks whether Mr. Vivian is at home——

Isabel (half aside). No, I cannot. (She sees, or rather thinks she sees that the servant is looking strangely at her.) Show Lord Walsingham in, and tell Susan to dress Master George, and to let me know as soon as he is ready. I want to take him out for a walk.

[Enter Lord Walsingham; exit servant.

Isabel (severely). Do you know why I received you? Because the servant was there. Vivian he was looking at me, because I was afraid he would ask me why I closed my door to you.

Walsingham. I have only a few words to say to you——

Isabel. So much the better, for I can only listen to you for a few moments (a pause). Why did you come? Why, after the letter I sent to you, did you not understand me?

Walsingham. You told me in your letter to leave London.

Isabel. Well?

Walsingham. I leave this evening. Did I not tell you so?

Isabel (in a harsher voice still). I know you told me so, but what proof have I?——

Walsingham. You have no right to doubt my word; I have always told you the truth.

Isabel (in a more gentle voice). Well, be it so. You are going away—I believe you; but you should have gone without coming to see me.

Walsingham. That was absolutely beyond my power.

Isabel. Oh!

Walsingham. You must not ask too much of me. Think what I was, and what I am. Everything was a jest to me formerly, and now? I should have laughed at anyone who had assured me that I should some day experience what I experienced just now on reading your letter. For a moment I felt determined to show my strength, my heroism. I wished to sacrifice myself completely; to go away without speaking to you without seeing you.

Isabel (in a weak voice). That is what you ought to have done; why did you not do so?

Walsingham. I had not the courage. After a few moments my first enthusiasm vanished, and I could only think of one thing—that I was about to be separated from you. Then I gave in, and it seemed to me that if you had the right to ask me to make such a sacrifice, I had at least the right to come and ask you to say a few words to me—a few words which would give me strength to make that sacrifice.

Isabel. Well then! I——

Enter Susan.

Susan. If you please, ma'am——

Isabel (with a cry of delight). My child! George is ready! Bring him to me, bring him here directly.

Susan. But, ma'am——

Isabel (to Walsingham). I am going out—you hear what I say. I am going out with my child.

Susan. Master George is not in the house, ma'am.

Isabel. Not in the house?

Susan. No, ma'am. When Miss Louisa went out, she took him with her.

Isabel (violently). Louisa! (trying to contain herself). Very well, Susan, if Miss Louisa has taken him out—very well. (Exit Susan.) (To herself.) Not even my child! No one to protect me! No one, no one!

Walsingham. Isabel!

Isabel. Oh, you will go, will you not? You will go at once? It is more necessary now than ever. You will go? Swear that you will.

Walsingham. Yes, I swear I will. I will leave London this evening.

Isabel. You know very well that I do not care for you, and that I never can. You ought to know it. And you, you say you love me; that is why I wish you to go. Understand me: if I were frivolous, as people say I am, and coquettish and cruel, I should ask you to remain, merely for my amusement. Plenty of women would believe in that way, but I cannot. You must go. You must forget me. Yes, you must, indeed; you must forget me—but not too soon!

Walsingham (taking her by the hands). Oh, Isabel, Isabel!

Isabel (freeing herself). This evening, will you not? You will go this evening.

Enter Vivian.

Vivian. You here, Percy? They didn't tell me.

Isabel. Lord Walsingham comes to wish us good-bye, he goes away this evening.

Digitized by Google

Vivian. You are going away?

Walsingham. Yes, I leave London to-night.

Vivian. Not for very long, I hope? London will miss you and will not be consoled until you return. We shall see you when you come back?

Walsingham. Yes—when I come back. (Gives his hand.) Good-bye. (To Isabel.) Good-bye, Mrs. Vivian.

Isabel. Good-bye, Lord Walsingham. [Exit Walsingham.

Isabel (aside). Now I have done my duty. Let me see if they will do theirs.

Vivian (sitting down by her side). Well, Isabel? I hope your father succeeded in amusing you a little. He promised not to leave you until——

Isabel. What my father had to say to me was not so very amusing (leaning on the back of the chair on which Vivian is seated, and looking at him full in the face). Louisa is going to leave us.

Vivian (suddenly starting up). What!

Isabel. Mr. Graham has made her an offer. She is sure to accept him.

Vivian (quickly). Impossible! (a pause).

Isabel. You seemed very much surprised just this moment; and now you say something which rather surprises me.

Vivian. I confess that at first I could not escape a feeling of egotism; I had become so accustomed to the idea that Louisa would never leave us. However, I was wrong.

Isabel. Then you will speak to her about it when she comes in?

Vivian. Speak to her? That is not decided yet?

Isabel. No, not yet. Mr. Graham has seen papa, that is all. He has not proposed to Louisa herself.

Vivian. It seems to me that it would be better for you——

Isabel (sparing before him). For me? Does it concern me—a serious affair like this? What do I know about it? (Sits down.) No, no; if some new style of dress had to be invented it would be different (throwing herself back in her chair, and stroking her dress like a child). No: it is not for me, it is for you to speak to her, and if you want my advice, the best thing you can do is to speak to her very plainly and decidedly.

Vivian (astonished at Isabel's tone). What!

Enter Louisa. (Isabel remains motionless and silent throughout this scene, and only takes part in it by the glances she casts from time to time at her sister.)

Louisa. Well, I have seen Mrs. Danvers. I have seen the governess, too. She is a very nice person. She will come in a few days. (To Vivian.) And how did you get on?

Vivian. I saw the man I had to see; but we have to speak now of a more serious matter.

Louisa. More serious?

Vivian. Above all, for you.

Louisa. For me!

Vivian. Yes.

Louisa. What is it, then?

Vivian. An offer of marriage.

Louisa. What, another!

Vivian. From Mr. Graham. Ah! you don't say "what, another," now?

Louisa. Pray understand me. Mr. Graham is admitted by everyone to be a man of great distinction. I confess, when I hear that he wishes to marry me, it makes me feel a little proud and above all exceedingly pleased.

Isabel. Oh!

Louisa. Yes, very pleased indeed. For when it is known that I have refused such a man as Mr. Graham, it will be quite understood that I do not mean to get married at all, and I hope then I shall be left in peace.

Vivian. You refuse him?

Louisa. Certainly I do.

Vivian. It is impossible.

Louisa (sitting down). Just remember. Two months ago I did not want to come and live with you, but you forced me to do so. (With gaiety.) So much the worse for you now. I am here, and you must let me stay.

Vivian. But pray consider——

Louisa (rising; with tenderness). Unless you are both of you displeased with me; unless you think that these—tiresome duties (smiles) which you have entrusted to me have been neglected; unless you assure me that by remaining here I am an obstacle to your happiness.

Vivian. Certainly not. If it were a question of our happiness alone, it would be quite another thing; but we are thinking of yours.

Louisa. Of mine?

Vivian. Yes, Louisa, of yours.

Louisa. Let me remain here, then, if you are thinking of my happiness only; for I shall never be so happy anywhere else. Indeed if you wanted to send me away now, I would not go.

Vivian (to Isabel). You hear what she says?

Isabel. Yes.

Vivian, You know her as well as I do. I think now it would be useless.

Louisa. Quite useless.

Vivian. However, if you like to try.

Isabel (sharply). Yes, I will try.

Vivian. I have not altered my opinion, Louisa. I think, my dear, that you really ought to accept him. But I am so pleased all the same at your refusing him that I really cannot persist; not just now, at all events.

Louisa. Neither now, nor at any other time.

Vivian (taking her by the hand). Oh, as for that——

Louisa. You know it is the case. What I say now, I shall say always.

[Exit Vivian, R. Isabel draws herself up, rises, passes round the piano and confronts her sister, who is on the point of going out, L.

Isabel. Where are you going?

Louisa. To get a book George asked me for; he left it in your room.

Isabel. George can wait for his book.

(Louisa stands still and then falls back astonished at the voice and look of her sister.)

Isabel. And about this marriage. You refuse, do you?

Louisa. Yes, I refuse.

Isabel. I see! That you may remain here—to make both of us happy.

Louisa. Isabel!

Isabel (coming to the front of the stage). It is really very kind of you, and I thank you for it from the bottom of my heart. The only thing I have to reproach you with is that you have not divided your attention very equally between us.

Louisa (who has also come to the front). Good heavens! what does she mean!

Isabel. You have thought of my husband, you have thought of my child; but me? You have rather neglected me! And you were wrong; for, if you had watched carefully, you would have seen that of all the dangers that menaced this house, which you had undertaken to defend, the gravest was undoubtedly on my side.

Louisa. I don't understand you.

Isabel. An hour ago Lord Walsingham was here by my side swearing that he loved me to distraction. My answer was that I did not love him.

Louisa. Well!

Isabel. It was untrue; I do love him.

Louisa. Oh!

Isabel. That was more than you could see, my dear sister; but it is just what you would have seen, if you had really filled the part which you accepted with such heroic self-denial.

Louisa. What you tell me is not true. You do not care for Lord Walsingham.

Isabel. It is true! I did not care for him two months ago; but during these last two months a great many things have happened. What at first was only a joke became in time a danger—a danger so serious, that seeing you had no idea of saving me I tried to save myself. My husband! My child! I wished to return to them. It was my only means of salvation. But my child was no longer mine. Between him and me you were always placing yourself.

Louisa. I will go, Isabel, I will go.

Isabel. You have robbed me of my child, and as for my husband——

Louisa. Your husband?

Isabel. When I remember the past; when I put one thing with another—my suspicions of to-day with my suspicions of former times——

Louisa. Your suspicions!

Isabel. Come, Louisa! Do not force me to say what I would rather not.

Louisa. Say it without hesitation. I was in love with your husband four years ago. Is that what you mean?

Isabel. You admit it!

Louisa, Yes, I admit that I was in love with him.

Isabel. Oh!

Louisa. But he was in love with you. Well, believing that you would be happy in his love, I took your hand myself, and placed it in his—and I was in love with him at the time. That you might have no scruple in accepting him I affected a gaiety I certainly did not feel. I told you that I did not care for him; and yet—yes, at that very moment when I was sacrificing myself for you both I was in love with him!

Isabel. And the very next day your love for him ceased?

Louisa. No, not the next day. I suffered a long time, a very long time; and perhaps what I underwent—perhaps the efforts I had to make to triumph over myself deserved a better reward than this. Have you forgotten everthing? Have you forgotten your own entreaties when I declined to come and live with you? Have you forgotten your astonishment when I persisted in my refusal? Have you forgotten that nothing could induce me to come?

Isabel. But you came at last.

Louisa, Because then I was sure of myself; I loved him no longer.

Isabel. Or because you thought the moment more favourable.

Louisa. Isabel! Can it be you who speak in this way?

Isabel. Yes; and I mean it.

Louisa (terrified). I will go, Isabel, I will go.

Isabel. You will go, will you? Sacrifice yourself again! No, my dear sister, it is not you who will go this time.

Louisa (in consternation). What do you say?

Isabel. Heaven is my witness that I was sincere in endeavouring to resist—in striving to defend myself. But some women are not capable of prolonged efforts; and, after all, I have a right to love those who love me.

Digitized by Google

Louisa (in consternation). What are you going to do?

Isabel. I confess myself beaten. I give the place up to you (goes to the back).

Louisa. Where are you going?

Isabel. You ask too much!

Louisa. Isabel!

Isabel (in a fury). Husband, child, you have robbed me of everything—now keep what you have taken! (Rushes into her room and shuts the door after her.)

Louisa (knocking at the door). Isabel! Isabel!

END OF ACT III.

FAIRPLAY AND MR. SIMS REEVES.

From the "Sunday Times."

We have received the following letter, and are pleased to "oblige" the writer by publishing it as requested:—

"SIR,—In your last impression you say Mr. Sims Reeves was too hoarse to sing with safety. I beg to contradict this statement. I was at Exeter Hall, and must say I thought Mr. Reeves sang better than he ever did. I am sure two-thirds of the people present came expressly to hear him, and I think it very bad behaviour on his part to refuse to sing. The truth is, he is the pet of the public, and so he thinks he can treat them just as he pleases. By inserting this in your next impression, you will oblige, yours faithfully,

"Feb. 7, 1870. FAIRPLAY."

It is not very easy to gather from one perusal of this communication that "Fairplay" is a worthy individual who has mistaken his powers. But reading between the lines with attention, the fact is clear enough. "Fairplay" was at Exeter Hall on Saturday evening last, and, like a reasonable man, was angered by the unreason of those who would have had their "pound of flesh" if they could, no matter what the suffering involved. We can sympathize with the feelings of our correspondent, because we shared them, and his resolution to go home and write to the Sunday Times was not only flattering to ourselves, but also honourable to him. Unhappily, when "Fairplay" took pen in hand, he used that dangerous weapon awkwardly. Our friend determined upon a course of action familiar enough, but which requires more skill than he seems to possess. He would show up the unreason which hissed Mr. Sims Reeves, by a satirical pretence of sharing it, in order to exhibit its real character. No doubt, he

> "sacred weapon, left for truth's defence, > Sole dread of folly, vice, and insolence," but it should be at the same time,

> "To all but Heaven-directed hands denied," and the hands of "Fairplay" are, we imagine, not Heaven-directed. His satire reads so uncommonly like a serious expression of opinion that it may work more harm than good. In this lies the reason why we do not print it without note or comment. The same feeling which led the schoolboy, after he had sketched a familiar bird, to write underneath, "This is a goose," leads us to show wherein the satire of "Fairplay" consists.

Will the reader be good enough to note, in the first place, with how authoritative an air "Fairplay" assures us Mr. Sims Reeves was not hoarse. We ventured, in noticing the concert, to express a belief in the ailment; "Fairplay" contradicts no point blank. His meaning is this:—As a matter of fact Mr. Sims Reeves never was hoarse, because he never can be. The throats of artists are invulnerable in proportion to the favour of their owners with the public. When a singer starts in his profession he is liable to suffer about the region of the larynx and air passages; but if he be prosperous, such liability ceases in course of time. Mr. Reeves has long been the first of tenors, and the notion of his hoarseness is absurd. As for the statement so often made, that his throat is more than commonly susceptible, it might as well be said that Baron Rothschild suffers from a chronic inability to pay protests. Though the reader may not have suspected it, this is what "Fairplay" means; of course, speaking (satirically) in the name of those who irritated him on Saturday night:—"I am sure two-thirds of the people present came expressly to hear him, and I think it very bad behaviour on his part to refuse to sing." This follows logically from what precedes. When nothing can be the matter with an artist, it is, undoubtedly, "very bad behaviour" for him to break off in the middle of a song and go home. It is very absurd behaviour, likewise. Bad conduct is far from gratifying even to him who is guilty of it; but when the loss of a considerable sum of money is involved, its indulgence becomes utter folly. These considerations, however, do not touch Mr. Sims Reeves, according to the affected showing of "Fairplay." That favourite tenor can sing, but he sometimes won't sing, and chooses to gratify his whim at the expense of his pocket. Surely there was keen satire hidden away in "Fairplay's" words.

The last assertion of our correspondent insinuates a good deal: this first of all:—Unreasonable people know not only the exact condition of Mr. Reeves' throat, but, also, the secrets of his heart. "The truth is"—mark the quiet confidence of "Fairplay's" words—the spoiled boy of his nurse, the public, delights to slap her venerable face, just for the fun of the thing, and heedless of the tingling fingers from which he suffers in return. But, after all, the sting of "Fairplay's" letter lies in its tail. The signature was our correspondent's happiest thought. Is it not "fairplay" to assume that a gentleman wishes to sneak out of his engagement with the public; and that, to deprive them of their paid-for pleasure, he urges an utterly false excuse. Is it not "fairplay" to state that all this is done out of a gross-grained nature, though the doer be the worse for it both in reputation and pocket? The fairness is unquestionable; and so, therefore, is the appropriateness of our correspondent's nom de plume. In conclusion, we have only to thank "Fairplay" for his letter. In return we have tried to show its meaning.

LEIPSIC.—In honour of Mozart's birthday, the programme of the fourteenth Gewandhaus Concert consisted exclusively of compositions by this master. The orchestra played the overture to Die Zauberflöte, and the C major Symphony, with the final Fugue. Herren David and Röntgen performed the Sinfonia Concertante for Violin and Tenor, with orchestral accompaniment. Herr Reinecke played the Rondo in A minor. Hdlle. Lehmann, of the Stadt-theater, sang an air from Don Juan, and from Figaro's Hochzeit, and the Paulliner Vocal Association sang the chorus "O, Isis."

THE LATE MR. GEORGE HOGARTH.

Mr. George Hogarth, for many years well known in connection with the London newspaper press, and as the author of several popular works on music (Memoirs of the Opera, Musical Biography and Criticism, &c.), died on Saturday morning, having passed his 86th year. In early life Mr. Hogarth was a Writer to the Signet at Edinburgh, where he was much associated with the literary celebrities of the day, including Sir Walter Scott, Lockhart, &c., mention being made of him in Prefessor Wilson's Noctes Ambrosianæ. In 1830 he came to London, and was engaged on the Morning Chronicle as a writer both on political and musical subjects; and was afterwards appointed musical critic to the Daily News on the establishment of this paper in 1846, under the then editorship of his son-in-law, Mr. Charles Dickens. This office Mr. Hogarth assiduously fulfilled until his failing health led, in 1866, to his resignation and retirement from the active work of a daily paper. He also held for many years a similar appointment on the Illustrated London News, besides having contributed to magazines and periodicals, and edited various works, both musical and literary. For a few seasons Mr. Hogarth was secretary to the Philharmonic Society. He married a daughter of the late Mr. George Thomson, of Edinburgh, whose name is associated with that of Beethoven, by the commission which he gave to the composer for arrangements of Scotch and other national airs with accompaniments. The kindly nature and genial temperament of the late Mr. Hogarth rendered him universally liked and esteemed.—Daily News.

On Saturday morning one of the oldest writers on musical topics in the newspaper press died, we may almost say, in harness; for it is scarcely three weeks since Mr. George Hogarth contributed a paper to the Illustrated London News, with which journal he had been connected for many years. His death took place in the eighty-seventh year of his age; and it was not until lately that feebleness overtook his naturally robust constitution. Mr. Hogarth was born in Edinburgh, and for a considerable period of his life was a Writer to the Signet. Coming to London he entered into the life of a journalist and critic, and was attached to the staff of the Morning Chronicle, which paper he left to join his son-in-law, Mr. Charles Dickens, who had established the Daily News, in the year 1846. He remained in the capacity of musical critic, a writer on this paper until his advanced age compelled his retirement from the more arduous duties of his vocation. As secretary to the Philharmonic Society, he interested himself deeply in its affairs, and wrote an elaborate history of its proceedings, extending over a period of half a century. He was the editor and author of several standard works, which are now generally received as the best modern authorities on the subjects of which they treat. Acute in all matters of musical judgment, Mr. Hogarth was as ready to perceive merits as to detect faults; and far readier to speak of the first than of the latter. His kindliness of criticism was indeed the only point in which he could ever incur the charge of literary weakness.—Daily Telegraph.

The next morning I ran off to see how Schubert was, as the state in which I had left him occasioned me anxiety. I found him in bed, fast asleep, with his glasses on his head, as usual. Scattered about the room in wild confusion lay the clothes he had taken off the night before. On the writing table was a sheet of paper half covered with writing, and on it an ocean of ink from the inkstand that had been overturned. On the paper was written: "Two o'clock, p.m." Then came a few confused aphorisms, and bursts of excited feeling. There could be no doubt that he had penned them after the angry scene of the previous night. I noted down the astounding passage: "Oh, Nero, you are to be envied, because you were powerful enough to destroy disgusting people in the midst of song and melody."

I waited till he woke up. "Is that you?" he enquired, when he recognized me. Then, pushing his glasses into their right place, he held out his hand with a friendly but almost confused smile. "Have you slept off your fit?" I said with a certain emphasis. "Pooh! nonsense!" he exclaimed, jumping out of bed with a loud laugh, "I could not help referring to the scene. "What will people think of you," I asked with somewhat of a reproving air.

"The blackguards," he replied quietly and good-naturedly. "Don't you know that they are the most intriguing bunkogs on the face of the earth? They are just the same with me as with others. They got what they deserved! I am sorry for it though, all the same. But I will write them the solos they want, and they will yet kiss my hand for it. I know their sort."—There is a bit of Schubert.

If, when he was excited by discussions on art, and by intoxicating drinks, the feeling of his own worth, compared to commonplace individuals, obtruded itself upon him more forcibly than would have been pleasing even to himself when sober, this only happened now and then, when he was in an exceptional mood. On other occasions, he never fonnd poor Franz aught but amiable and retiring, most warmly devoted to his friends, as proved by the letters I have quoted, and willingly acknowledging anything that others did, going for instance into ecstasies at every fresh specimen, however small, of the talent of my genial friend Schwind. For what was bad and preposterous, on the other hand, he entertained a feeling of downright hatred.

Schubert's mode of life was simple like himself. Every morning at nine o'clock, the Muse sought him, seldom leaving before two o'clock, and not till after presenting him with something valuable. When he had hit upon anything particularly excellent, he became more than usually good humoured, and was the life and soul of all his set in the evening. But a man is not always inspired; and though in certain things comparatively realistic, Schubert was not free from a touch of romantic exaltation. He fell, for instance, madly in love with one of his pupils, a young Countess Esterhazy, to whom he dedicated one of the most beautiful things he wrote for the piano, the four-handed Fantasia in F minor. Besides visiting the house of the young lady's father to give lessons, he sometimes went there under the protection of his patron, Vogl, the singer, who associated with princes and counts as with his equals; always talked very graciously to them, and when he had the good-sooner under his wing, behaved like the keeper of a menagerie, with some peculiar rarity from the animal kingdom to exhibit. Schubert was not averse, on such occasions, to be left in the background, for he could then devote all his attention to his adored pupil, and drive Love's dart still deeper in his heart. For a lyric poet as well as for a composer, an unhappy passion, if not too unhappy, is, perhaps, an advantage, since it increases a subjective sentiment, and imparts to the poems and songs springing from it, a colour and tone of the most beautiful reality. Productions such as the "Beiden Sulelka," the "Zürnende Diana," a great deal of the "Müllerlieder," and the "Winterreise," all musical confessions, steeped in the fervour of true and profound passion, are purified and refined as genuine artistic works in the most perfect form, proceeding from the gentle heart of the enamoured writer. In Schubert, however, there slumbered a double nature. The Austrian element, coarse and sensual, was evident in it as well as art. New and fresh melodies, together with harmonies and rhythms gushed in endless abundance from his richly gifted mind, but they not unfrequently bore signs of having emanated from the soil so rich in tradition from which the composer himself had sprung—though this is far from being meant as a reproach! Just as the folk's song generally is the foundation of opera, so must also both the songs and operas of a nation be formed and developed in accordance with its peculiar musical susceptibility. I need only mention Rossini, Auber, and Weber, and refer to the widely different course pursued by the operas of various nationalities. The Italian barcarole, and the French song and romance have retained as a rule their stereotype form; the German Lied, however, appears capable of endless extension. At first, it was a simple song with strophes, as with Reichardt and Zelter, Zumsteeg subsequently brought the carefully composed ballad into vogue and this lasted till Schubert created his short lyric dramas of the soul. It is true that since that time the German Lied has made no further progress of importance, for, though we cannot think lightly of the purely artistic, noble, and poetic form, with which Mendelssohn invested it, yet, with this master, invention, the original and creative element, does not go hand in hand with acquirements and artistic development. With Schubert, on the contrary, there is much to blame in the form, and in the musical treatment, as well as in the fresh melodies themselves. The last are sometimes too national, too Austrian, and remind us of folk's tunes, the somewhat low handling and disagreeable rhythm of which do not quite justify their forcing themselves into a poetical Lied. On this subject we had occasionally discussions with Master Franz, as for instance, when we attempted to prove to him that certain passages in the "Müllerlieder" reminded the hearer of an old Austrian Grenadier-march and tattoo, or of Wimzel Müllers: "Wer niemals einen Rausch hat g'habt."—He either grew seriously angry at such petty irritating criticism, or laughed at us and said: "What do you fellows know about it? So it is and so it should be!"—But so it should not be: that is to say: he was bound not to mute simply as gushing high spirits and undeveloped youth dictated, and in his later and more mature productions there are none of the student-like, trivial motives to which we objected.

But if, in social intercourse as well as in art, the Austrian character was sometimes rather too uproariously manifested in Schubert, as a young fellow full of life and high spirits, on other occasions the demon of melancholy and sorrow overshadowed him with its dark wings—though it was certainly not altogether a bad spirit, since in the sombre hours of its visitations it frequently suggested to him some of his most painfully beautiful songs. But the combat between a wild roystering life and incessant mental activity is always exhausting, if there is no proper equilibrium in the soul. In our Schubert, however, there was however, an ideal passion at work, refining, restraining, and compensating, and we may regard the Countess Caroline as his visible and beneficent Muse; as the Leonora of this musical Tasso.

The same thing happened to Master Franz that happens to all other German composers: as long as he lived he was sighing for a really good libretto. It is true he had completed some operas such as Alphons und Estrella, and Fierrabras, as well as the operetta, Der hausliche Krieg, which, some thirty years ago, produced and created a furore, but, in consequence of the indifference of managers for what is poetical and really beautiful, soon disappeared from the bills, because it—did not suit manager's pockets to employ first-rate artists in such a trifle. Schubert had long begged me among the rest to write him a libretto. I passed the spring and summer of 1826 with a friend in the Carinthian mountains. On cold and rainy days I arranged the legend of the Count of Glaichen as the subject for an opera, and wrote to apprise Schubert of the fact. He was not long answering. The letter addressed to both friends, though strange to say I alone am apostrophized throughout,* runs as follows:—

"My dear Bauernfeld,

"My dear Mayerhofer,

"That you should write the opera was a very sensible proceeding on your part, but I wish I saw it before me. I have been asked for my opera books, to see what could be done with them. If your libretto were quite ready I might show the people that, and, when it was approved, for I have no doubts as to its value, I might begin on it in Heaven's name, or send it to the Milder at Berlin. Mdlle. Schechner has appeared here in Die Schweizer Familie, and been extraordinarily successful. As there is great similarity between her and the Milder, she may do for us.

"Do not remain away too long; it is very melancholy and miserable here.—The spirit of wearisomeness has made too much progress. From Schober and Schwind one hears nothing but lamentations, which are far more heart-rending than those we heard in Passion Week.—I have scarcely been to Grinzing once since you left, and with Schwind not at all." (Here follows one or two allusions of a private nature, and not suited for publication.) "Out of all this you may do a nice little division-sum in jollity. Die Zauberflote has been performed very well at the Theater an der Wien. Der Freischutz, at the Imperial Kärnthnerthor-Theater, very badly. Herr Jacob and Mad. Rabere in the Leopoldstadt, unsurpassable. Your poetry published in the Modenzeitung" (I do not know to what poetry he refers) "is very beautiful, but that in your last letter is more so. The elevated jollity and comic sub-

* This has reference to the use of the second person singular in the original, a nicety to be rendered in English only by an equivalent, and not by "Thou," "Thee," etc., which, thus employed, are un-English, a fact that has not appeared to strike a great many very estimable individuals who—with the help of a dictionary—are in the habit of translating from French and other foreign tongues. These worthy persons do not seem aware that what is an "idiotisme," as the French say, in one language, may, in another, become an Idiotism, which is a very different thing.—J. V. B.

limity, and the particularly tender outcry of pain at the end, where you bring in the good town of Willach—ah-ach—in a masterly manner, place it among the finest specimens of this kind of composition" (I had written a kind of parody: Die Lustigen in Willach, describing our bucolic life among country people stewards, gamekeepers, clergymen, and their fair cooks). "I am not working at all—The weather here is really fearful; the Almighty appears to have deserted us entirely; the sun will never shine even for a moment. It is May, and you cannot sit out in a garden. Fearful! Terrible! Horrible! For me it is the most cruel state of things possible. Schwind and I want to go in June with Spaun" Leopold Hofrath, and my official superior) "to Linz. We can meet there or in Gmunden, only let us know for certain—as soon as possible. Don't wait two months first. Farewell!"

Thus ends the epistle. He was so absent he had forgotten to sign it. It is, by the way, the only letter I possess from Schubert to myself. The rest, as well as letters from Rupach, Zimmermann, Tieck, Meyerbeer, Mendelssohn, and other deceased celebrities, have fallen into the hands of the confounded autograph-collectors, who are never tired of asking for a speciman.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERT.

(From the "Pall Mall Gazette.")

First in importance of last week's concerts was that given at the Crystal Palace on Saturday. The programme contained at least two works of high interest, beginning with Mozart's overture to what he loved to call his Munich Opera. We have no right to assume that our readers know the story of Idomeneo, for the work is never heard in England, and only one detached piece, "Placido è il mar," has become familiar. It may, therefore, be necessary to mention a few particulars. Towards the close of 1780, Mozart, then in his 25th year, was commissioned by the Elector of Bavaria to write an opera for the next carnival. Selecting the story of Idomeneo, King of Crete, which curiously resembles that of Jephthah, and entrusting the libretto to his father's friend, the Abbate Varesco, Mozart left Salzburg for Munich on the 6th of November. By the middle of January the opera was ready, and on the 29th it was performed in the presence of a distinguished and enthusiastic audience. Then terminated an era in the history of the lyric drama. Applying his genius to the work which Gluck carried on as far as contemporary intellectual powers would allow, Mozart did for Italian opera seria all that could be done. Progress afterwards required another goal, and in the Nozze de Figaro, we see the artificial Italian school abandoned, that, as Herr Wagner observes, "the capabilities of music to respond passionately to the genius of the poet, might be shown by a natural unealculating method, teuthfulness of dramatic expression, and endless variety of airs and tunes." Idomeneo, though undramatic and wanting both variety and movement, foreshadows the change in the number and character of its choruses, as well as in the richness of its orchestral colour. The latter quality those who know no more than the overture played on Saturday might infer. Remembering when the overture was written, its bold instrumentation can hardly fail to astonish. For nothing approaching Haydn had given no precedent, as is the popular idea, and this fact "G." should have pointed out. In his essay, Mozart ses Œuvres, son Influence sur l'Art et les Artistes, M. Fétis says:—"To prove that all these inventions really belong to Mozart, it is only necessary to recollect, that in 1780, when Idomeneo was composed, Haydn had neither written his six symphonies for the Duke of Wurtemberg nor those for the Loge Olympique, which are dated 1784, nor the Seven last Words, nor his twelve symphonies for Salomon's concerts, which did not see the light till 1792. In these last works alone the illustrious symphonist employed all the resources of the orchestra previously to writing the Creation." M. Fétis may be very often wrong, but here he does justice to the subject of his essay. The overture was followed—Handel's "Nasce al bosco" impertinently coming between—by "Zeffiretti lusinghieri," an air sung by Ilia at the opening of the third act, and remarkable for the exquisite contrast it presents to the tumultuous business immediately preceding.

Spohr's Historical Symphony (Op. 116), the second orchestral work in the programme, naturally excited a good deal of interest, after lying by for twenty years. Its character and purport are original and, happily, singular, the object being to illustrate the style of four different epochs, viz., 1720 (Handel and Bach), 1780 (Haydn and Mozart), 1810 (Beethoven), 1840 (modern school). To accept this work at all one has first to grant that each part of a symphony does not belong to the rest in the sense that an artistic conception would be incomplete without it. The Pastoral of Beethoven and the Reformation of Mendelssohn—to bring forward obvious examples—show most clearly the unity apparent in all symphonies by the great masters. Spohr chose to violate this essential principle. In his Historical there is no such thing as unity. Each movement stands isolated from the rest, and the whole is a concourse of atoms without affinity, which the whim of a music-maker has arranged in classic form. But the work is more than artistically bad; it is historically untrue. Each of the first music may be written in imitation of bygone styles (which we readily do so long as several imitations are not called a symphony), fidelity on the part of the copyist should be exacted. With this necessary virtue Spohr was not endowed; and the result is that anybody accepting his work in unquestioning faith would be guided to singular conclusions. He would discover, for example, that though the outline of music has changed, though at one period scholasticism has prevailed, at another melody, at another eccentricity, and at another noise, yet its details have remained the same. Always, he would believe, the art has been characterized by unvarying mannerisms, ornate harmonies, endless modulations, and a sickly if elegant sentimentalism. Assuming for our misguided student an inquiring mind, he would next seek after the cause of a result so unprecedented. Of course his search would be useless, unless indeed he discovered the falseness of his teacher. Perhaps no composer of eminence was less fitted for the writing of historical music than Spohr. His limited knowledge, still narrower sympathy, and intense individuality were barriers not to be surmounted. As a consequence we find that, while the phrases in his symphony may be the phrases of Handel, Mozart, or Beethoven, their treatment is undoubtedly the treatment of Spohr, who no more successfully hides himself than did the fabled quadruped among the lions. "G." tells us that the composer was "thoroughly in earnest," and Spohr himself has left it on record that he "made formal studies for the opening movement." We believe each assertion, but neither earnestness nor formal studies," nor both combined, could avail a man unable to get out of himself. A criticism in detail of the Historical symphony would only confirm these general remarks. In the opening movement, where imitation is most successful, the Pastorale is unmistakably Beethovenian. In the larghetto whole phrases taken from Mozart are dressed up in Spohr's manner. Referring to the scherzo, "G." says, "Spohr could not imitate Beethoven; the idea is too absurd to be contemplated for a moment;" while as regards the finale we need only mention that in it the ponderous German tries to be a "lively Gaul." The last movement offended Mendelssohn (as it offends "G."), because not representing the best modern music. Mendelssohn's serious view of art rejected Spohr's caricature, which we imagine sprang from egotism. The "Jupiter" Air was most popular at the time, and thus the German master took his revenge, doing on his own behalf as a composer what he did for himself as a violinist in the concerto, "Past and Present." It must not be assumed from the foregoing remarks that we find nothing in the symphony to admire. On the contrary, we see a good deal that is clever, and yet more that is interesting. But these things cannot atone for misuse of the symphonic form or for badness of imitation. The work had every advantage in Saturday's performance. Though new, probably, to all but one or two in the orchestra, it was given under Mr. Manns' able direction with unqualified success.

Schubert's Alfonso und Estrella was the concluding overture. We have left ourselves no space for criticism either of it or of the well-selected pieces sung by Mdlle. Carola and Signor Foli. The first movement of Beethoven's violin concerto was, as on former occasions, played so admirably by Mr. Carrodus that the whole work might have been given without wearying the audience.

HERR GOLDSCHMIDT'S RUTH.

A correspondent (Dr. F. Rs.) has sent us the following:—

"The Dusseldorf Gazette, January 21, 1870, contains an interesting report of the performance of Ruth, by Otto Goldschmidt, which took place under the leadership of the composer, assisted by Mdme. Lind-Goldschmidt, Miss Asmann, the Messrs. Wagner, Blass, and the Dusseldorf Choral Society, from which we extract the following narrative:—

"'Ruth' had yesterday a great success, and is considered a clever work, though the style of Mendelssohn, Goldschmidt's master, is throughout the whole too much imitated. The musical ideas are flowing and fresh, the harmonies are interesting and well adapted, the instrumentation effective, and the whole work is a superior production written by an artist who fully understands his art, and is acknowledged as a composition of merit and standard value. The solo singers, the chorus, and the band, performed admirably. Mdme. Lind-Goldschmidt's singing was, as in former times, perfection—beautiful even in the minutest details. No artist can rival the performance of this Queen of Song.

"'Mr. and Mdme. Goldschmidt received an enthusiastic reception, and were recalled at the end of the performances with deafening applause from an overcrowded house.

"'We congratulate both on the great success achieved in Dusseldorf, the town where Mendelssohn and Schumann elevated the art and produced many of their admirable works; where Mdmes. Kemble, Clara Novello, and other distinguished English artists have assisted at most renowned musical festivals and on other grand occasions, where they have reaped well-merited laurels.'"

The Musical World.
LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1870.

£10,000.

CONTEMPLATE, O Reader, the power of money, with appropriate texts!—

"O, thou powerful metal! what authority
Is in thee! thou art the key of all men's Mouths; with thee a man may look up the jaws
Of an informer, and without thee, he Cannot the lips of a lawyer."

"Thou visible god,
That solderest close impossibilities,
And mak'st them kiss; that speak'st with every tongue,
To every purpose! O, thou touch of hearts!"

"'Tis gold
Which buys admittance; oft it doth; yea, and makes Diana's rangers, false themselves, yield up
Their deer to the stand of the stealer; and 'tis gold
Which makes the true man kill'd, and saves the thief;
Nay, sometimes hangs both thief and true man. What Can it not do and undo?"

We shall not expound these texts, because their exposition may safely be left to every man's inner consciousness, and because their simple enunciation suffices to bring the reader's mind en rapport with our subject. But we must not leave the impression undisturbed, that money is necessarily a power for evil. It is an impartial agent, and blesses with as much readiness as it curses. Used for high and noble purposes, it shines with the lustre of heaven, as well as with the more obvious glitter of earth. "By doing good with his money a man, as it were, stamps the image of God upon it, and makes it pass current for the merchandize of the upper world." It is pleasant, therefore, to think of every well spent sovereign going about with a celestial imprint; and whenever we hear of wealth devoted to lofty objects, we should rejoice—as at so much force taken from the devil, and turned against him.

Imagine how the hearts of your good men everywhere beat high when it was announced, a few days ago, that the Right Honourable Earl Dudley and Ward, &c., &c., &c., had offered £10,000 to the Restoration Fund of Worcester Cathedral, on condition that the building should be exclusively devoted to religious worship. Good men everywhere looked at the amount, and, being generally well able to appreciate that sort of thing, they rejoiced over Earl Dudley, as over one of themselves. "Not many great, not many mighty are called"—is stated on supreme authority; but here was a great and mighty one showing his pious zeal. Who doubts that many Hosannas were sung over Earl Dudley's strong religious feeling, quite apart from the money he offered to the religious treasury. All which was very right and proper. Such a "brand plucked from the burning" gave good reason for Hosannas.

But when good men looked at the conditions of Earl Dudley's offer they must have rejoiced yet more exceedingly. "Zeal for the Lord's house" is accounted no ordinary grace, and indicates an advanced stage of the process known by theologians as "sanctification." This may be accounted for by the fact that it is usually an expensive grace; but, anyhow, its possessor becomes entitled to particular veneration. His name is buried in the heart of foundation stones, appropriately accompanied by coins of the realm; or emblazoned on painted windows, for the behoof of future generations. It may even be, if he keeps a good establishment, that the Bishop of the diocese hallows his roof-tree with the episcopal presence. Hence the apparition of Earl Dudley, emulating David and Solomon, is cause for rejoicing over and above that excited by the noble lord's abstract piety.

But this is not all in the case, which makes glad the tents of Israel. Earl Dudley's offer accepted, there will for ever be an end to the sacrilegious fiddling which, once in three years, turns Worcester Cathedral into a concert-room. How many devoted Christians have burned to imitate their Master, and, with a cat-o'-nine-tails, clear the temple of those who buy and sell tickets! But, as this course would have ended in Worcester lock-up, and as the martyr spirit is extinct, they have bottled their holy indignation. Imagine the delight of these good folks now that Earl Dudley, backed by so potent wealth, is trying to bribe out the fiddlers. Imagine, too, with what prayers they urge the £10,000 towards the treasury of a needy Restoration Committee! It is true that to stop the Worcester fiddling would, probably, be to stop it at Hereford and Gloucester also; and, thus, to take away from certain widows and orphans the pittance which keeps a roof over their heads. But this consideration is not likely to trouble pious people much. They are forbidden to do evil that good may come, and can quote largely about the seed of the righteous never having been caught begging their bread.

For all these reasons Earl Dudley's name is high among the brethren. But, what does the "world" say? How do the cynical, unbelieving outsiders treat the affair? As usual. They hint that Lord Dudley cherishes an anti-Festival mania, which has burst out afresh, because last year, it was evident that nobody minded his opposition. They believe that the noble Earl, irritated at success gained in spite of aristocratic influence, has made up his mind to try the full power of his long purse. Hence the dangling of 10,000 sovereigns before the dazzled eyes of Dean and Chapter. Lord Dudley was doubtless prepared for this interpretation of his act, and is not likely to be much affected. Misrepresentation is one of the thorns in that narrow path which lies before every godly man.

What will the Dean and Chapter do?—that is the question. On the one side, they see the pleading faces of widows and orphans; on the other, a renovated building. Will they think more of bricks and mortar than of flesh and blood? We shall not know for some time to come; but meanwhile let us put before them two extracts from the Book of which they are authorized interpreters:—

"Howbeit the Most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands." | "Know ye not that ye are the temples of God?"

THE Dogen of the musical press must not pass away without the honours earned by a long life of usefulness, and a "conversation" which gave offence to no man. George Hogarth, who, at the good old age of 86, has gone from us, did pioneer's work in his youth. Leaving writing to the Signet (and contributing to periodicals well-known to every lover of that literature for which Scotch genius did so much), he came to London, and, in the columns of the defunct Morning Chronicle, astonished those who knew how to judge, by the apparition of musical criticisms written with both knowledge of the art and zealous interest in its progress. This was the beginning of a change in every way for the better; and how Mr. Hogarth further carried out his mission (for mission it was), in the Daily News and other journals, need not be stated. Musical criticism grew into a profession, and the sower of the seed happily lived to see the results—of which, perhaps, he had never dreamed. In other ways Mr. Hogarth made his mark. As historian of the art he will, though dead, continue to speak. As a man, his kindly disposition must cause him long to be remembered. George Hogarth, living, had no enemies; George Hogarth dead, is mourned by troops of friends. He was not only an acute and learned, but a kindly critic, looking always for merits rather than for faults. Apart from criticism he was one of the best of "good fellows"—as Shelley would have said, "one of the salt of the earth."

GOOD NEWS.—Mr. Punch informs his readers that his "Essence of Parliament" (the most incomparable of the kind ever published) will be resumed. This means that Mr. Shirley Brooks is convalescent.

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAINE.—A two-act opera, entitled Das Testament, has been successfully produced at the Thalia Theatre. It is from the pen of Herr M. Wallenstein, conductor of that place of entertainment.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

MM. STRAKOSCH AND VIZENTINI, of Le Télégraphe, have written to a batch of French composers asking for a list of dramatic works, either finished or in hand. From eleven published replies we gather that France is in a condition to export operas to any extent on receipt of orders. Let not Englishmen be, therefore, down-hearted at the contrast supplied by their own country. We may not be able to show native operas, because there is no chance for the article; but it may be asserted with confidence that the crop of symphonies, oratorios, and such like is immense. We should like to get up the statistics, but the fear of their overwhelming us is a deterrent. This may be done however. Let every musical man ask his musical acquaintances how many composers they know with burdened portfolios. The result would go some way towards soothing an irritated national pride.

IT cannot be said that artists go to their graves unbonoured in the New World. Herr Gottschalk died the other day, away down in Brazil, and ever since there has been a chorus of elegiac "spread-eagleism" all over the continent. A South American paper exclaimed: "Another Levite for the temple of immortality; another star for the firmament of God!" Thus was taken up by a Northern journal: "When he placed his hands upon the key-board his individuality was swallowed up in the infinitude of his ideal and his love. He was sovereign master of his key-board: he knew all its measures; he made it speak, groan, cry, shriek, and sink away—the passion all burned out—in the sweet and serene aspirations of the soul. When conning over his pianoforte, in the pride of a warrior, there was a tumult of material phenomena, and a clamour of violent passions that were dazzling and stunning until soothed again by the charm and sensibility of his marvellous and mind-deifying creations." Is it not true that a man has need to be saved from his friends after death? With the best intentions the worst results are often achieved. Herr Gottschalk was a respectable artist, but his memory will hardly have justice so long as a high pressure sounding of trumpets proclaims him only a little lower than the seraphs.

THE late pianist, Kalkbrenner, was very proud of the affix, "von," to his name, and seized with eagerness on every opportunity of directing attention to it. "Are you aware," he said, one day, to a friend, "that the nobility of my family goes back as far as the Crusades? One of my ancestors accompanied the Emperor Barbarossa ——" "on the piano?"—interrupted his friend.

HERR H. WAGNER'S Lohengrin is still underlined at the Brussels Opera, but serious doubts are beginning to be entertained by the public as to its ever being produced—at least, not until the world has advanced more considerably into the Future than it has done at present. The Prophet of that remote period does not appear quite as popular in this capital as he is in Munich. Thank goodness, tastes differ sometimes.

HO! THERE, GUARDIAN.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—I have received the following from my esteemed and estimable friend, Short:—

"DEAR HOUSE,—I observe that the Guardian, a theological paper, accuses two boys, the Le Jeunes, of a want of accent—boys, moreover, who accentuate from the pores. Wherefore? Thine, "T. DUFF SHORT.

"Short Common, Jan. 14th."

Read the above as to accent.—Yours, feebly, SIDCOCK HOUSE.

MAYENCE.—At the last concert of the Art Association, Herr C. Oberthür, from London, played, in conjunction with Madame Schott, a duet of his own composition, on motives from Oberon, for harp and pianoforte. Both Herr Oberthür and his fair colleague were greatly applauded.

BRUSSELS.—For some reason or other, there has been a misunderstanding lately between the management of the Théâtre de la Monnaie and the first tenor, M. Morère. But all the little differences between the two having been satisfactorily arranged, M. Morère has made his re-appearance as Robert le Diable.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

Madame Montserrat gave a soirée musicale at the Beethoven Rooms, on the 11th inst., and notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather a numerous audience attended. Miss Seagrave sang the new waltz aria, "The Naiades," brilliantly. Madame Montserrat gave Francesco Berger's "Night bird," accompanied by the composer, and other popular songs. Miss Jessie Royd and Signor Caravoglio also sang. Herr Wiener played Ernst's fantasia on airs from Otello, and a new solo Ballade of his own, on the violin, and with Herr Lehmeyer an Allegro scherzo, by Rubinstein. Herr Lehmeyer, besides presiding at the pianoforte, played Liszt's Rigoletto, and with Miss Charlotte Jones, a Duo on airs from Elisir d'Amore.

Mrs. H. Montagu-Symonds gave a "Literary and Musical" evening at St. John's Wood last week to a large number of her friends and admirers. Mrs. Montagu-Symonds has many requisites for a public reader. Her enunciation is distinct and her manner ladylike. Among the pieces she read was Eliza Cook's "The Mother who hath a Child at Sea," which was listened to with great interest, and obtained unmistakable marks of approval. The "Reading" was interspersed with vocal and instrumental music. Madame Marie Stocken favoured the audience with the grand scena from M. Ambroise Thomas's Hamlet, which, notwithstanding she was evidently suffering from a cold, she sang with marked expression; Miss Gertrude Mayfield gave Signor Randegger's grace-ful song, "Peacefully Slumber;" Mr. E. G. Coleman, M. Emile Berger's "A Message from the Deep;" and Millie. Heilbron, a clever child pianist, some piano compositions. Several other musical pieces were given, and the performance altogether afforded general satisfaction.

SATURDAY BALLAD CONCERTS.

The last day in the week is now first in music. Saturday Afternoon Concerts at the Crystal Palace; Saturday Evening Concerts in Exeter Hall; Saturday Ballad Concerts in the Hall of St. James; and Saturday Operas in that of St. George; here, surely, is enough to atone for past neglect, and to give Saturday absolute pre-eminence. But our business lies only with the Ballad Concerts, which began last Saturday night, under Mr. John Boosey's direction. Some well-known artists were engaged, to wit—Mesdames Sherrington, Liebhart, Elton; Messrs. Rigby, Chaplin Henry, Distin, and Patey; with Miss Kate Roberts and Mr. Carrodus as solo instrumentalists, Mr. J. L. Hatton acting as conductor. The programme, a very lengthy one, contained many familiar songs, new and old; most of which were received with favour, and upon once of which it is necessary to dwell. The Orpheus Glee Union agreeably varied the proceedings. About the success of Mr. Boosey's Saturday scheme little doubt can be entertained.

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

Verdi's "Les Brigands."

Referring to this opera now performing at the Athénée, the Telegraph's own correspondent says:—

"The performance on the second night of Les Brigands was as serious as anything could be. Many expected it to be a parody, by Verdi, of Offenbach's Brigands, now playing at the Variétés. Imagine their disappointment at finding it to be a French version of Il Mom-cheri, an opera brought out at Her Majesty's Theatre in 1847, which not even Jenny Lind, then in the first bloom of her fame, could force down the ears of the Habitués. Yet it was well played, and the picture of old Lablache, as Maximilian Moor, in one of the most striking in my gallery of operatic recollections. Some few of your readers may confess to remembering that the story is founded upon Schiller's Robbers. That dreary and overrated play does not make a lively libretto, nor is there much in the music to reconcile one to the story. Two capital choruses, full of the dramatic vigour that Verdi always has at command, a soprano solo with harp obbligato, and a duo d'amour for soprano and tenor, after the manner of that in Don Pasquale—these are the only pieces which have the slightest hold on the ear. The rest is sound and fury, signifying nothing. Yet the opera was vociferously applauded, not by the claque, but by the general audience. We are fond of noise here, you know, and we admire nothing so much as military precision. It would have done Sir Michael Costa's heart good to hear the choruses fired off in volleys. They were marvellously well sung, but I should have enjoyed them more if I had not been afraid that the fierce singers, who seemed to be of gigantic proportions, would first break the drum of my ear, and would then charge the audience and clear the house, just as the Operahouse here is cleared by a file of soldiers after the last dance of a masked ball. The prima donna, Mdlle. Marimon, is a lady who must be spoken of in all seriousness. She has a pure soprano of very charming quality; she sings florid passages with facility and spirnò, and she has a great deal of dramatic intention. She is, in fact, very nearly a first-rate artist. M. Jourdan, the tenor, is tout ce qu'il y a de plus Frenpain, and the other singers are quite capable. I question if an opera is ever so well rehearsed in London as this has been; but it is of far too large proportions for a diminutive stage; and, although Verdi's music has been three and twenty years in bottle, it does not taste well, even in a cellar."

PROVINCIAL.

Dundee.—The Dundee Advertiser of Feb. 10th, in a notice of a recent concert by the Santley tour party, has the following reflections about the influence of good pianoforte playing upon the town of Dundee and its neighbourhood:—

"Of Madame Arabella Goddard's pianoforte playing what need is there to speak? The most strenuous efforts of quite a host of competitors—male and female—have failed to lower the standing this lady has so long had, as a first-class pianist. New stars have arisen, only to pale their light by comparison with hers. Some, in spite of sensational puffing, have gone out, while Madame Arabella Goddard keeps her place, as she first gained it—by real merit. We are glad there are other renowned players in Britain than she; for it tends to an increased admiration of her superior excellence when comparisons are made. There is nothing so directly conducive to the healthy tone of pianoforte education in a town like Dundee as such performances as those this lady gave last night. Teachers and pupils both are liable to a little conceit over the result of their labours, and a relaxing of effort is the inevitable result. Contentment is doubtless a virtue; but it is good for students to know that there are possibilities to which they have not yet reached, and which, though they may never reach, a knowledge of their existence will exalt and purify the taste at every stage of progress. Thus it is we wish Madame Goddard could be induced to visit our town oftener. That she might do so, we doubt not, if fair promise of support were held out. It is for the pianoforte-playing portion of the community to see to this, for it concerns them more than the general public; and there is certainly a sufficient number of this class amongst us to give the fair executant a generous welcome. The number of pianos now in use in Dundee is as fifty to one, compared with twenty or thirty years ago; and if Dundonians, by desire, encourage musical taste at home, would but take up this matter of inviting an occasional public visit from so cla-sical a player as Madame Goddard, the routine of lessons pr-ctising would be both more pleasant and more profitable. Madame Goddard played five solos last night—airs from Der Freischutz written for her by Benedict. Handel's celebrated air and variations in E major, fancifully called by music publishers, 'The Harmonious Blacksmith,' was her second solo. The pianoforte used by Madame Goddard was one of Messrs. Broadwood's iron grands—a fine an instrument as we have ever listened to, even from this famous house."

About Herr Wilhelmj and his various performances at the concert under notice, the same journal speaks as below:—

"Herr Wilhelmj proved himself fully worthy of all the very high encomiums that have been pronounced on his violin playing. It is not of the ultra-sensational school, but shows a more equal ability shown in his simplest passages than in all the filigree nonsense with which some players excite ignorant wonderment. His first solo, 'Airs Hongrois,' by Ernst, demanded a vast amount of executive skill, which was yielded with an ease and grace of manner and a freedom from effort that only the accomplished player can command. Particularly were we delighted with the style in which he gave the adagio variation. The cantabile playing was perfection itself. In the second part, he played a Reverie by Vieuxtemps. Both it and the encore reply—namely, a cavatina by Raff—were magnificent specimens of violin playing. The famous sonata in G of Beethoven was played by Madame Goddard and Herr Wilhelmj in a style that might have pleased the great master himself. High finish and truthful expression were given to each movement. The andante was a display of rare excellence, and the finale, taken at its utmost speed, came out in all its beautiful design with the greatest clearness."

About Miss Annie Edmonds the writer speaks in the following eulogistic strain:—

"Miss Edmonds we have heard for the first time, and are glad to find in her all the qualities of a thoroughly educated concert vocalist. The two ballads she sung were Horn's 'I've been roaming' and Whittaker's 'Say not woman's heart'—genuine English songs both, well-made music, requiring skill and taste of an order not over plentiful in these days of blustering art. Her treatment of these songs was to our mind faultless. Especially were we pleased with the one first mentioned; it was so natural, so unpretending, and so highly expressive of the subject. For the second she was encored (in fact, each piece in the programme was encored, with but two exceptions—a sure evidence of the audience's delight, it 'not of its good taste'); and in answer she gave 'The Bailiff's Daughter of Islington' with such delicious sweetness, as to invest it with fresh interest. Miss Edmonda has a remarkably fine voice. We use the word fine in its proper sense, meaning purity of quality. It is moreover, singularly equal in quality and power throughout its register. With such an organ in good cultivation, and possessing such expressive power, Miss Edmonda is destined to occupy a very high position in her profession. Especially will she please an educated audience. Her success last night was unequivocal; and we may, therefore, promise her a hearty welcome should she ever again visit Dundee."

Digitized by Google

How so eloquent a writer does justice to Madame Sioico, and our illustrious baritone, Mr. Santley, may be easily imagined.

GLASGOW.—Mr. Sims Reeves is once more enchanting the amateurs of Glasgow with his inimitable operatic ballad singing. The subjoined is abridged from the Glasgow Daily Herald, of the 15th inst.:—

"Last night an audience that filled the Theatre-Royal in every part assembled in expectation of hearing the Beggars' Opera, with Mr. Sims Reeves as Captain Macheath. In this expectation they were disappointed, in consequence of the indisposition of Miss Ida Jackson. The Beggars' Opera was unavoidably postponed, and the indulgence of the audience solicited in favour of the Waterman, as substitute. Great as must have been the disappointment, it was a convincing proof of the popularity of Mr. Reeves that the intimation was received with warm applause. It was wise to make any arrangement that would not deprive the public—even for one night—of the gratification of hearing Mr. Reeves, more especially as he had kindly consented to sing, in addition to the customary songs, 'Tom Bowling' and 'Rule, Britannia.' In one respect, more than in any other, Mr. Reeves commands our admiration—his great versatility. This wonderful power has been acknowledged on more than one occasion, even by eminent composers of music themselves. This winter we heard him in sacred music—the highest department of all. Who can forget his late rendering of the Messiah Passion music, or the great scene from Sullivan's Prodigal Son, 'I will arise.' These were given with a devotional feeling which could not be equalled by any other artist in our time. Then, again, we had never heard Beethoven's immortal love song, 'Adelaide,' so admirably interpreted as by him. Last night's entertainment again proved that in the matter of ordinary ballads and airs, which, when rendered by most vocalists, sound almost vulgar, Mr. Reeves has only to sing them and they become invested with the charm of musical inspirations. What could be more exquisite than his rendering of 'Tom Bowling'—a simple ballad, into which he throws a feeling of the utmost tenderness and pathos? The 'Trim-built Wherry' he sang without accompaniment, and with all the more effect. In 'The Bay of Biscay' he roused his audience to enthusiasm, which they expressed by a complete ovation. 'Rule, Britannia' brought the comedietta to a conclusion amidst the heartiest and most unanimous applause. Miss Jane Vinci played Wilhelmina, and Mr. Fitzroy was Bundle. We cannot say that Mr. Reeves was fortunate in the accompaniments of the orchestra. When will Glasgow possess a dozen instrumentalists, fit to play simple accompaniment in tune and time? This, surely, is not asking too much. Glasgow has been fortunate in getting Mr. Reeves, notwithstanding the weather, in such excellent voice. Unfortunately for the public, and still more for Mr. Reeves, he has a most delicate throat, which the slightest cold affects, and naturally enough he is unwilling at such times to imperil his reputation by singing. During the present winter he has suffered much, and consequently been unable to fulfil some of his engagements; and, as usual, rumours not less false than wicked have been circulated. That he should decline to fulfil engagements, except for the reason we have indicated, can hardly be supposed, when it is remembered that he thereby suffers a serious pecuniary loss, and furthermore disappoints the public, with whom it is his especial interest to be on the best terms. We were glad to find Mr. Reeves last night in such good voice, and we should advise all lovers of unexceptionable vocalization not to miss the opportunity of hearing him. He is yet to appear in Guy Mannering, and, as we have already stated, in the Beggars' Opera."

SOUTHAMPTON.—From the Weekly Hampshire Independent we learn that the fourth annual concert given by Mr. R. Sharpe came off at the Victoria Rooms, and proved a marked success. The concert was under the patronage, of the Mayor and Mayoress, the Members for the Borough, and most of those supplemented their patronage by attendance at the concert, the dress seats, with few exceptions, being wholly filled. The vocalists were Miss Fanny Lanham and Miss Marion Severn, both of the Royal Academy of Music; Mr. Henry Taylor, lay vicar of the Salisbury Cathedral. The Instrumentalists were Mr. C. Fletcher, of Southampton (violin); Mr. Arthur Guest, of London (violoncello); and Mr. R. Sharpe (solo piano). The concert opened with an instrumental trio, with Mr. R. Sharpe at the piano, and Mr. Fletcher and Mr. Guest as his associates. Miss Fanny Lanham, our gifted young townswoman, sang "Una voce poco fa," with hearty demonstrations of approval. Miss Severn gave "The days that are no more" (Blumenthal) and Haxton's "Huntingtower." Miss Severn is a vocalist whose talents must prove welcome anywhere. Mr. Taylor's contributions were "Total eclipse," and Mr. Sharpe's serenade, "Violeta," charmingly rendered. Mr. Guest played a violoncello solo on airs from Martha, arranged by M. Paque; Mr. R. Sharpe a sonata in F minor, composed by Mr. Arnold, and one of Schubert's impromptus; Mr. C. Fletcher a caprice by Vieuxtemps; and the three gentlemen another trio. The concert will bear favourable comparison with any yet given under the auspices of Mr. Sharpe. The pianoforte was one of Broadwood's magnificent concert grands.

LIVERPOOL.—The Daily Post informs us that the Societa Armonica entertained a crowded audience in the Liverpool Institute on the first, we think, of their regular appearances for the present season. The performance was described by those who gave it as simply an "open rehearsal," but its quality and execution would have fully justified them in using the more dignified name of "concert." The programme was a high-class one, and well-arranged. The chorus is not very strong, numbering only about thirty voices, and the orchestra does not include more than two dozen players, but both the vocal and instrumental sections show themselves to be trained much beyond the usual amateur average. The different parts are fairly balanced, and, with one or two minor exceptions, they worked exceedingly well together, under the vigilant direction of Mr. Armstrong.

We take the following from the Liverpool Daily Courier:—

"The re-opening of the organ of St. John's Church, Waterloo, is to be celebrated on Wednesday week, with full choral service, the choir numbering about fifty voices. The sermon is to be preached by the Rev. Dr. Clarke, of Southport, and Mr. James J. Monk will preside at the organ. The musical portion of the service will comprise the Canticle and Deus from Mr. W. T. Best's Service in F, which has only been once rendered in Liverpool, at St. Nicholas's Church; Mr. Arthur S. Sullivan's 'Strain upraise;' 'The Son of God goes forth to war,' a fine arrangement of St. Ann's tune; 'O give thanks,' a prize anthem of the College of Organists, by Henry Hiles, Mus. Bach., Oxon, which will for the first time be performed out of London; 'Ascribe unto the Lord,' by Travers; and the 'Hallelujah,' from the Messiah—the last two after the sermon. The organ is by Messrs. Bishop & Stow, of Liverpool, and the musical service, with which its re-opening is to be celebrated, promises, to be very interesting. We hear that Mr. Monk has secured the aid of some of the best church singers in Liverpool, and that he is now superintending the rehearsals."

DUBLIN.—From a notice in the Irish Times of the 15th inst., we take the following:—

"The first concert of the Glee and Madrigal Union, in the Ancient Concert Rooms, was remarkable for the introduction of some novelties. The company gave Ansley's glee, 'When the fair Moon,' Webbe's 'Wheo winds breathe soft,' and Dr. Wesley's 'I wish to tune my quiv'ring lyre,' which latter obtained the prize of the Gentlemen's Glee Club in Manchester, in 1833. We may at once state that greater perfection in part singing has never been surpassed in our city, and this applies to all the concerted selections. That such excellence has only been attained by the utmost assiduity on the part of the executants those familiar with part-singing can understand. Enough to record that the public are now appreciating this class of entertainment as it deserves."

WORCESTER.—In Berrow's Worcester Journal of Feb. 12, we read that during the week, Mr. John Russell's Covent Garden Opera Company have performed Offenbach's operatic extravaganza, The Grand Duchess of Gerolstein, at the theatre, which has been attended by large and delighted audiences. Without attempting to criticize the musical abilities of individual members of the company, we may say that the choruses are well given, the acting is capital, and the orchestral music is admirably rendered by the band, under the conductorship of Mr. Reed. The rôle of the Grand Duchess is taken by Miss Emily Soldene, who shows herself an actress of the highest order; a better representation of the part one could not wish to see. Mr. E. Rosenthal as General Boum (the Commander-in-Chief), Mr. H. Raynor as Prince Paul, and Mr. W. Raynor as Nepomuc (the Duchess's aide-de-camp), are most effective; and the piece throughout is thoroughly well acted.

LEITON.—In the Nottingham and Midland Counties Daily Express of Feb. 12, we read that a most interesting gathering of the aged poor of Leiton took place in the Boys' Schoolroom, in connection with the parish church. About a month ago a concert was given by Mr. H. Farmer, and a number of ladies and gentlemen in aid of a fund to be devoted to the relief of the poor of both Old and New Leiton. The attendance was large, and the entertainment realised £31. At the time various suggestions were made as to how the money could be best distributed. Mr. John Mansfull, who rendered able assistance in the promotion of the concert, hit upon a plan which was carried out—viz., a tea meeting, at which the most deserving poor might assemble, and each person afterwards receive an equal share of the proceeds.

NEWPORT PAGNEL.—Mr. R. W. Pringle, organist of the parish church, gave a morning concert on Saturday, in the Public Room. Mr. Pringle sang "If doughty deeds," Balfe's "Reaper and the flowers," and, with Mad. Ellse, John Parry's duet, "A. B. C." She also played a solo by Ascher on the piano. Mad. Ellse gave a song by Miss Gabriel, and was loudly applauded, as was also Miss A. Dwight, in the 'Nafades' and 'Ah che assorto.' Mr. C. J. Bishenden, in "The Sea King" and "Dearer to my soul thou art," created a favourable impression. The whole was under the direction of Mr. Lansdowne Cottell, who presided at the pianoforte, and performed a fantasia of his own. The room was well attended.

EDINBURGH.—From Edinburgh we learn that Mr. Mackenzie's third "Classical Chamber Concert" attracted a crowded audience; Handel was a feature in the programme. An interesting item was a Romance for violoncello, composed by Mr. Mackenzie. The Scotsman writes as follows:—

"We had occasion recently to speak in favourable terms of a string quartet from his pen given with great success at a former concert. It is gratifying to see one of our resident musicians adventuring on this high branch of musical composition, which requires not only sound theoretical knowledge, but creative power. The Romance played so admirably by Herr Daubert, will not detract from the reputation of Mr. Mackenzie as a composer. Its reception was such as to show that it had enlisted the sympathies of the audience, who recalled both author and executant."

STOURBRIDGE.—From this place a correspondent writes as follows:—

"The third of a series of amateur entertainments has taken place in the Girls' Schoolroom, Birmingham Road, under the presidency of the Hev. Br. Osborne. The programme began with a 'reading' of Hood's "Eugene Aram," by the Rev. W. Katterns, and was varied by many songs and glees, which afforded evident satisfaction. An amateur, Mrs. Bourne, made a marked impression both as a singer and composer. A local journal writes that the song 'Tears, idle tears,' was exquisitely rendered by Mrs. Bourne, a lady to whom frequent praise has been accorded for valuable aid given to charitable undertakings. On this occasion the audience were favoured with a 'taste of her quality' as a composer. The programme admitted that the piece de résistance of the evening was her 'Sing me to rest,' interpreted with refined feeling by Mrs. Bridgewater. Another of Mrs. Bourne's compositions was 'Bird of the Wilderness,' the beauty of which was rendered all the more apparent by the performance of the obbligato flute part by Mr. W. H. Richards. This gentleman also accompanied Mrs. Bourne in 'Sweet and low,' an example of finished execution, combined with cultivated vocalization."

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

Madame Schumann was to have appeared on Monday night for the first time this season; but her arrival having been delayed by tempestuous weather, her place was supplied, at short notice, by Miss Agnes Zimmermann, who performed the pieces set down in the programme, which consequently remained unchanged:—

PART I.

Quartet in E flat, Op. 12	Mendelssohn.
Song, "Deh per queste" (Clemenza di Tito)	Mozart.
Sonata, in A major, Op. 101, pianoforte	Beethoven.

PART II.

Quintet, in E flat, Op. 44, pianoforte, two violins, viola, and violoncello	Schumann.
Songs, "Der Neugierige," "Wohin,"	Schubert.
Quartet, in F major, Op. 77, No. 2	Haydn.

The sonata, the twenty-eighth of the series, belongs to Beethoven's later period, when his independence of form and precedent had become complete. To replace Madame Schumann in this and in the quintet by her late husband—her performances of both being fresh in general recollection—was an arduous task, and Miss Zimmermann's success on this occasion afforded fresh proofs of the ready preparation of that accomplished pianist. Her performance in both instances was received with marked expressions of approval, shared in Schumann's work by Herr Joachim, Mr. L. Ries, Herr Straus, and Signor Piatti. How finely these gentlemen played Mendelssohn's quartet (the first in publication, but the second in order of production) and that by Haydn, need not be said. The Canzonetta in the first-named work was tumultuously encored. Mdlle. Clara Doria was the vocalist, and gave the songs specified (the third encored) with bright quality of voice and genuine expression, aided by the excellent pianoforte accompaniment of Mr. Benedict. Mdlle. Doria is a good "find" for Mr. Arthur Chappell. Rarely, of late years, has a new comer created a more legitimate and favourable impression.

Madame Schumann is to appear on Monday night, and at the Saturday afternoon concert, to-day.

THE REID CONCERT.

This annual affair took place for the thirtieth time on Saturday last. From a lengthy report in the Daily Review we condense as follows:—

"PROGRAMME.—Part I: Introduction. Pastorale, Minuet, and March, General Reid; Overture, 'Ruy Blas,' Mendelssohn; Recit. and Air, 'The Mighty Master,' 'Softly Sweet in Lydian Measure,' Handel—Mr. W. H. Cummings; Pianoforte Concerto, in F Minor, Weber; Song, 'Rose softly blooming,' Spohr; Symphony, in E flat, the 'Eroica,' Beethoven. Part 2: Overture, 'Manfred,' Schumann; Romance, in G, Beethoven; Song, 'Happy Hours,' H. S. Oakeley; Air de Ballet, 'Rosamunde,' Schubert; Recit. and Air, 'Zeffiretti lusinghieri,' Mozart; Pianoforte Solos: Prelude and Fugue, Impromptu No. 1 Op. 29, Chopin; Overture, 'Guillaume Tell,' Rossini.'

"On Mr. Hallé entering the platform he met with a most enthusiastic reception. No time was lost in starting with General Reid's compositions, the same which are invariably played every year. Mendelssohn's inspiriting overture was played with all the spirit it demands, and was thoroughly effective. Mr. Cummings sang with great taste the air from Alexander's Feast. Weber's pianoforte concerto was charmingly played by Mr. Chas. Hallé. It was a most satisfactory rendering both on the part and that of the orchestra under the guidance of Mr. C. A. Seymour. In the very graceful song from Asor and Zemira, 'Rose softly blooming,' Miss Wynne achieved a marked success. The whole symphony was superbly played, and, in spite of its great length, was listened to with unwavering attention, and received with great applause. The compiler of the Crystal Palace programmes, which Professor Oakeley largely quotes, is evidently an ardent admirer of Schumann, and expresses his admiration in no measured terms, but he cannot be induced to admit that of the overture to Manfred much may remain obscure. This is precisely our own opinion. Perhaps better acquaintance might help to remove the obscurity. Madame Norman-Neruda, after her charming performance of the Romance, received quite an ovation. Not less applause was that which she returned to the platform; but the audience continued to cheer. The accomplished violinist again returned, without her instrument. This evoked disapprobation from the more noisy of the clamourers, and Mr. Cummings came forward to sing (he was received by a few ungentle hisses). Mr. Hallé, however, was inexorable. Unquestionably one of the gems of the concert was the delightful 'Air de Ballet" from Rosamunde, which took all present by storm. We could have wished that Mr. Hallé would for once have relented and allowed it to be repeated. A word of eulogy is due to Miss Edith Wynne for the passionate expression with which she sung the aria from Idomeneo. Mr. Hallé's performance of Bach's 'Prelude and Fugue' and Chopin's 'Impromptu' was marked by his usual elaborate finish. Rossini's brilliant and popular overture brought to a successful termination a concert equal to the best of its predecessors. Professor Oakeley may be congratulated on the complete success of his efforts to make the 'Reid Commemoration Concert' the great musical event of the season."

Robert le Diable, at the Grand Opéra (with Mdlle. Nilsson as Alice), is expected to be magnificent.

KARLSRUHE.—Mad. Viardot-Garcia's two-act opera, Der letzte Zauberer, was produced recently before a densely crowded house, the Grand Duke and all his Court being present. The audience expected a great treat, but appeared to think, on the whole, that their expectations had been considerably disappointed.

ESSEN.—The Florentine Quartet, under the direction of Herr Jean Becker, played at a concert recently given by the Solier Musical Association. The programme comprised Quartet No. 1, G major, Mozart; Spharen-Adagio, Volkmann; Presto from Suite in D minor, Hartog; Andante and Scherzo Variazioni, from the grand D minor Quartet (posthumous), Schubert; and Quartet in E minor, Op. 59, No. 2, Beethoven. The artists were enthusiastically applauded.

ST. PETERSBURGH.—A grand concert was given a short time since for the benefit of the Patriotic Schools, as they are termed. The Emperor, the Empress, and the Imperial family were present. The great feature of the performance was Madame Adelina Patti's rendering of the "Cruelissa" from Rossini's Messe Solennelle, and of the final rondo (with the flutes) from L'Etoile du Nord. In reply to an irresistible encore, the fair singer gave the national air, "Solowei" ("The Nightingale"), in which she was enthusiastically applauded. The receipts of the concert amounted to more than two thousand four hundred pounds.

LEFEBURE-WELY.

(From "The Musician.")

English Church musicians have, for the most part, their own view of the deceased French organist. Although both as composer and executant he exercised a not inconsiderable influence in the formation of the modern French organ school, it may be questioned whether his labours really advanced the true interests of art. Lefébure-Wély and his fellows are a creation of circumstances which do not affect us in England. The brilliant and dramatic masses and other service music of the Roman Catholic Church of modern times has long had the effect of indisposing the worshippers of that faith to listen to the strict organ music of Bach and Mendelssohn; and thus has arisen a demand for a more orchestral and dramatic handling of the king of instruments. The question propounded to themselves by the late Lefébure-Wély and his followers was not how they could sustain organ music in its special dignity and purity, so much as how they could supply organ voluntaries which should satisfy popular cravings, by relying upon the more worldly qualities of strongly expressed and exciting emotions, and incessant brilliant action. On the other hand, these men have in a certain direction, and with the aid of modern mechanical improvements of an orchestral tendency, succeeded in adding to the number of organ effects by building upon orchestral methods. The organ music of this school is but one more illustration of the craving for high colouring in all branches of modern art. In breadth of conception, and in a certain large method of handling his material, such as it was, Lefébure-Wély probably surpassed most, if not all, of his contemporaries. Some of his music, however, borders upon the limits of vulgarity. He had, however, to a considerable extent, the precious gift of tune, a strong sense of rhythm, and an appreciable grasp of form and proportion. His harmonies are at times characterised by chromatic crudeness, though occasionally he attained boldness and weight. The offertories, graduals, communions, and other organ works of this writer are, for the most part, well known in England. He also laboured in other branches of the art—notably as an arranger. His adaptation, for instance, of the famous old air of Stradella's, in D minor, for violoncello and piano, has enjoyed much popularity on the Continent, as an effective piece of chamber concert music.

CARL MARIA VON WEBER.*

Weber arrived in Paris on the 26th February, 1826. The very same day he paid visits to Paër, Catel, Auber, Cherubini, and Rossini. The last received him with a courtesy that would have done honour to a diplomatist. Weber visited, also, Desaugiers, Berton, Kreutzer, and Kalkbrenner. At a dinner-party given in his honour by Schlesinger, the publisher, he met Pixis, Platow, Onslow, and a crowd of others, men of journalists, who said they were going to write such glowing artichet about him that they quite turned his head, the consequence being that, to maintain his incognito, he fled from Paris the next morning. He carried with him, however, delicious reminiscences: that of La Dame Blanche and that of—some charmingly fresh oysters. "The oysters we get at Dresden," he wrote to his friend Theodor Hell, "are execrable. As for La Dame Blanche, such a comic opera has not been written since Le Nozze di Figaro." In both cases, by the way, the great feature was that of indisputable freshness.

Weber, consequently left Paris on the 2nd March, notwithstanding his promise to get up Euryanthe at the Opera, and the fact of his receiving a commission to write three works for the lyrical theatres of the French capital. The next day he reached Calais, where he had such a violent attack of spasms, that, for some time, those round him thought he had ceased to exist. He crossed the Straits, and at Dover found a high officer of police, charged to receive in England "the celebrated composer, Carl Maria von Weber," and spare him the disagreeable process of going through all the formalities connected with passports, custom-house, &c. On arriving in London, he alighted at the house of Sir George Smart, whose acquaintance he had made the year previously at Ems and Dresden, and who resided in Great Portland Street.

Weber was preceded by a colossal reputation when he arrived in England. His Der Freischütz excited nowhere else the enthusiasm it occasioned in London. All the theatres had seized on and brought it out, each according to its resources. In most cases, it was subjected to strange omissions or augmentations. Thus, at the English Operahouse, where it was produced in July, 1824, the celebrated tenor Braham, afterwards the first representative of the part of Huon, in Oberon, introduced the old German air, "Gute Nacht," and an English Polacca, which was then the fashion; the duet in the second act, as well as that between Agatha and Max, was replaced by pieces borrowed from other works; while, lastly, in another theatre, the favourite rondo, and the duet between the two women, used to be spoken. Despite of these mutilations, Der Freischütz became, we repeat, more popular in London than anywhere else. Then Euryanthe, and Preciosa, performed during the summer of 1825, had not met with success; the English people reserved all their favour for Der Freischütz. Great, therefore, was their delight when they heard that Weber had come to London to conduct the performance of a new opera, and to have fragments from Der Freischütz executed at concerts. The first concert-programme contained no less than twelve numbers from the favourite work, and all of them, including the overture, were encored. At the Philharmonic Society, the rendezvous of the fashionable world of England, the maestro did not achieve much more than a succès de curiosité. The same thing occurred at Berlin, at Vienna, and at Dresden. Weber's vivacious and lively genius was repugnant to the artificial tastes of the aristocracy, though it went direct to the soul of the real public. Weber was then what he is at the present moment: a popular composer, in the widest and most glorious acceptation of the word.

The rehearsals of Oberon began on the 9th March; Weber selected the tenor Braham for the part of Huon, and that excellent artist, Miss Paton, for that of Reiza; Mad. Vestris played Fatima. The members of the chorus were perfect; the scenery and dresses ready, so that the rehearsals were rapidly pushed forward. Meanwhile, the maestro added several pieces to his work. In the first place, he wrote a scene instead of Huon's grand air in the first act, because the air was too high for Braham's voice: he wrote also, for the same artist, the rondo in E minor. On the 19th of March, he had put the finishing touch to the finale of the third act, and, on the 9th April, to the overture. Lastly, on the day following, he composed the Prayer in C major. He then set actively to work on the pianoforte arrangement which was terminated, and, on the 22nd March, handed over to Kemble, whose property it was, in virtue of the agreement between him and Weber.

After sixteen rehearsals, Weber, satisfied with his interpreters, pleased with the scenery, and in ecstasies with the costumes, copied from old illuminated manuscripts, or from the drawings of travellers who had been through Arabia—Weber informed Kemble that he might fix any night for the production of the piece. The last rehearsal took place on the morning of the 12th April, and the first performance came off on the evening of the same day.

The scenes that had taken place at Berlin and Vienna were repeated in London. Several weeks previously all the available tickets had been bought up for the first twelve performances which Weber was to conduct himself; but, notwithstanding this, the servants of the highest noblemen fought with each other when the doors were open, having been ordered by their masters to give any price for the places usually kept for the general public.

When Weber reached the front of the theatre a voice cried out: "There comes Weber!" A solemn silence—and what a silence it was —followed these words. On entering the orchestra, the trembling composer thought the house was empty, and he took his seat. Bursts of applause, mingled with cheers, immediately burst forth: everyone rose to do honour to the composer of Der Freischütz, and a good quarter of an hour elapsed before silence was restored.

The overture, splendidly dashed off, was encored. The following pieces were interrupted two or three times by marks of the greatest enthusiasm. The grand air composed for Braham, was encored, as well as Fatima's romance in the second act. The audience wanted to hear the finale, also, twice, but, on account of the stage business, Weber did not comply with their wish. In the third act, Fatima's ballad obtained the honour of an encore; in fact, not a piece passed without exciting frantic applause. From the beginning to the end of the performance, there was not a single mark of disapprobation,—no, not one. And yet the ordeal took place before one of those English audiences, one half of which has always insisted, from time immemorial, on hissing what the other half applauded.*

When the curtain fell for the last time, there was a tremendous cry for Weber. It was the first time such a thing had been known in England. The honour of a re-call had not been awarded to Rossini. The papers did not fail to censure strongly this Continental importation. In fact, the press seemed generally bent on quelling this Anglo-Parisian enthusiasm, which bordered upon delirium. It was—ought we to be astonished?—extremely severe, and unanimously declared the new work "to be wanting in melody," whilst its scoring, was "heavy." It was thus that—at that time—critics in London

* From La Revue et Gazette Musicale.

* This interesting fact in the social history of England is one of which I frankly own I was entirely ignorant, previously to my reading the present biographical sketch of Weber. It is astonishing how much information—startling from its novelty—an Englishman may pick up, in the works of intelligent foreigners, concerning his own country.—J. V. B.

wrote on art. * Weber, always very sensitive about the opinions expressed on his works, was profoundly cut up by these stupid and partial attacks, which Posterity, however, has utterly repelled.

It was only by a prodigious effort of will that the maestro was able to prolong his existence. He seems to have disputed with death every day, every minute, every guinea, alas! which went to improve the circumstances of those belonging to him. Though dying, he still found strength to appear in public and conduct his works. It is thus that we find him, on several occasions during the month of May, lending his assistance to artists, friends of his. On the 30th May, six days before his death, he conducted, at Miss Paton's benefit, the overture and all the second act of Der Freischütz.

Among these concerts there was one which still marks an epoch in the biography of Weber: the concert of the Royal Society of Musicians, to which he was invited. It was usual that foreign artists invited to the grand meetings of this celebrated society should compose, as a mark of respect, a piece to be performed by the full band. Winter, Haydn, and Spohr, had in their time complied with this custom. Weber, who felt himself dying, and, in fact, could no longer hold his pen, at first refused. During one of his long sleepless nights, however—it was the night of the 5th of May—he happened to recollect a motive which figures in the Six Easy Pieces for Four Hands, a work dating from 1809. This echo of a very remote Past held him firmly as though in a spell; his mind fixed on this melody of his youth; other ideas crowded on and were added to it; the whole assumed body and form, and the composer, pale and tottering, rose from his bed, to write down the fine March which figures as No. 8 among his posthumous works. The next morning, he dictated the greater portion of it to his faithful friend Furstenau. Who would fancy that this composition, so chivalresque in its plan, so dignified, so brilliant was the work of a dying man, whose sole wish was to live a few days in order that a stranger's hand might not close his eyes?

The March was performed with great success, as was, also, the overture of the Spectre King at the concert given on the 16th May, by the Royal Society of Musicians. Weber was unable to attend, being engaged at the Oratorio Society (?), where he condneted twelve fragments from Der Freischütz and the "Jubel-Ouverture."

Despite so many things aggrossing his attention, despite so much fatigue, and so much suffering, it was to his own concert, fixed for the 26th May, that Weber directed all the intellectual and physical strength he had left. For this occasion, and in compliance with the courteous request of an amateur, Mr. Ward, he consented to write a piece for Miss Stephens. That lady had chosen the verse:—

"From Chindara's warbling fount I come," from Thomas Moore's Lalla Rookh.

After long fruitless attempts, during which the composer entered in his pocket-book: "Tried a long time; found nothing; poor Weber!" inspiration returned, like a sudden ray of light. On the 18th May, the Muse once more touched with her wings, but for the last time, him whom she had so cherished. Weber composed the air of Lalla Rookh. He could write down only the vocal part, however, and, at his concert, played the accompaniment from memory. Moscheles published this composition.

Perhaps the shortest concert notice ever written appeared in the last number of Le Télégraphe:—"Excellence du programme, enthousiasme du public."

The Passion drama, represented every ten years at Oberammergau, in Bavaria, will be given once a-week, from May to September next. Arrangements have been made for the accommodation of 15,000 persons.

M. Pasdeloup gave his patrons the following last Sunday:—Schiller March, Meyerbeer; Symphony in A, Beethoven; Overture, Midsummer Night's Dream, Mendelssohn; Fantasie for violin, Vieuxtemps; Prelude, Liszt.

The unpublished pieces by Rossini, performed at the concert in aid of the Italian Society of Paris were these:—Valse de Boudoir, and Un Rien, for the piano; Il Fanciullo Smarito and La Tirana alla Spagnuola for tenor and soprano, respectively.

By the weekly report of the Port St. Martin, it appears that as the first five nights the receipts were 2,321f. up to 7,125f., the total being, within over £1,100. On Sunday was the hundredth representation of Frou Frou, which has produced £18,000, author and composer getting £2,160.

A correspondent writes to inform us that: "During the months of May and June, a series of English operatic performances will take place at St. George's Hall, Langham Place, W., under the direction of Mr. C. J. Bishenden, the base. Some of the best artists are engaged, and a new opera will be brought out, the principal part of which will be taken by a well-known lady of title."

We regret to announce the death at William Edward Cockrum known as Leigh Wilson, the tenor vocalist. The deceased gentleman was confined to his room on the 9th inst., of brain fever, and expired on Sunday morning last, at the early age of 34. The body has been conveyed for interment to Bristol, of which town deceased was a native.

At a dance in San Francisco, a young lady, who was particularly accommodating in the dressing-room, about assisting other good-looking girls in fixing up, putting on slippers, and lacing corsets, turned out to be a young man. As soon as the girls found it out they "interviewed" him, and he now uses hair restorative and court plaster, and carries his nose in a sling.

Mr. Otto Goldschmidt's Ruth was given on the 20th ult. by the Allgemeiner-Music Verein, in the Ton Halle, Dusseldorf, under the direction of the composer, the soprano part being sung by Madame Lind-Goldschmidt. The performance, which was attended by the Court and upwards of 2,000 persons, was greatly successful, several of the morceaux being vehemently encored. Mr. and Madame Goldschmidt received quite an ovation, and the applause at the conclusion was enthusiastic and prolonged.

* This was certainly very degrading for England, especially as the critics of other countries acted so differently! We all know how unanimous those of Berlin and Vienna were about Der Freischutz, and, also, how ecstatic those of the latter capital were for a still greater work, Fidelio, which, in consequence of their glowing criticisms, proved such a tremendous hit on its first production.—J. V. B.

Madame Schumann is to make her first appearance to-day, at a Saturday Popular Concert. She will play a sonata, by Beethoven, and Mendelssohn's second trio, with Madame Neruda and Signor Piatti.

Herr Joachim is to play the violin concerto of Herr Max Bruch at the Crystal Palace Concert of to-day. The symphony is Schubert's undiscussed B minor (which ought to have been the highly-endowed composer's masterpiece). The overtures are Die Zauberflöte of Mozart, and the Meerstille of Mendelssohn (a goodly programme).

At the Royal Gallery of Illustration, Mr. and Mrs. German Reed's entertainments almost invariably enjoy a long "run," and they are justly entitled to it; but the lessees have seldom been so fortunate as in the production of Cox and Box, with Mr. Sullivan's melodious and truly humorous music. Cox and Box passed its 250th representation last week, and was listened to with unflagging interest by a crowded audience. Mr. Reed, we hear, has another novelty on the tapis.

It is purposed to produce on the 18th May, at St. James's Hall, for the first time, under the patronage of H.R.H. the Princess Christian, an oratorio entitled The Return of the Prodigal, by the Rev. H. H. Limpus, minor canon of St. George's, Windsor. The performance will be conducted by Mr. Benedict. The principal vocalists engaged are Mesdames Lemmens-Sherrington, and Patey-Whytock; Messrs. Vernon Rigby and Lewis Thomas. Dr. Elvey, of St. George's Chapel, will preside at the organ. The chorus is to include delegates from St. George's Chapel, Eton College, together with members of Mr. Barnby's Choir, and some members of the best choral societies in London. The proceeds are to be devoted to the funds of the Clewer Convalescent Hospital.

The following is the text of the note addressed by Mrs. John Wood to the actors, authors, artists, and critics, who celebrated the one hundredth night of She Stoops to Conquer by a dinner at Verrey's last Thursday:—"Dear Mr. Hingston,—Please say to the gentlemen who honour me with their company to-day, how much I regret that my state of health will not permit me to meet them at dinner. I thank them most gratefully for their kindness as critics, artists, and friends, and for the advice and assistance which have enabled me to carry on the season at the St. James's so successfully, and to achieve for She Stoops to Conquer this unprecedented run. Beg of them to accept from me the little bouquets which accompany this note. If all wear them, there can be no jealousies, and you remember the old adage, 'A flower in the buttonhole is worth two in the hand.'"

Lord Dundreary is one of those strongly-marked creations of the imagination that sturdily refuse to be consigned to oblivion, and, granted that Mr. Sothern remains healthy, strong, and free from accidents, there is no reason that he should not present his lordship ten years hence with all the éclat that now signalizes his return to the Haymarket. The part is not one that can be seen at second-hand, or comprehended through the medium of hearsay; it is an original invention that owes its vitality to the perpetual presence of the inventor—that is to say, Mr. Sothern himself. "None but himself can be his parallel." According to the announcements, the performance of Our American Cousin will only continue for a fortnight.

It is now said that it is difficult to find a situation for the new opera-house that is to be; that the Colosseum—most unlucky of show-places!—has been offered, but (says the Athenæum) the common sense of the projectors refused it; that the ground in Leicester Square, including, it may be presumed, the site of Saville House, does not bear on it a clear title. A sufficient space in a practical London neighbourhood seems priceless. But of one thing all projectors may rest assured, that the entertainment which is real and thoroughly carried out will attract and hold its public, however questionable the locality. When Madame Vestris took the Olympic Theatre, in Wych Street, it may be doubted whether one out of the tweety magnificent coachmen who nightly deposited the choicest, most difficult, and most aristocratic audiences of London there to see her exquisitely-prepared performances could, without inquiry, find that obscure piece of diversion in an abominable neighbourhood.

REDUCED POSTAGE FOR PRINTED MATTER.—It is singular that this country, which first set the example of a cheap postage, should now be behind Continental nations. Printed matter abroad is carried at very much lower rates than in this country, to the great benefit of the community. Circulars, newspapers, and books, and even small parcels, are transmitted by the post in foreign countries at rates which should put Englishmen to shame. The Government, last Session, expressed itself favourable to a reduction of the rates, and the Post Office officials, it is well known, are quite ready to undertake the service. In the multitude of other pressing duties it may be overlooked, and the Council of the Society of Arts of London have, therefore, appointed a committee to take steps for urging upon the Cabinet the great importance to all classes of reducing the postage on printed matter to one-halfpenny instead of a penny, as at present, for every four ounces weight. Whilst the question of the education of the people is exciting an all absorbing interest at the present time, it must not be forgotten that the cheap circulation of printed matter is no unimportant item in its advancement. All classes should give their support and influence on behalf of this committee, which sits at John Street, Adelphi, London.

From Mr. Charles Vezin, the brother of our accomplished actor, Mr. Hermann Vezin, and the consul in Philadelphia of the North German Confederation, we get some particulars concerning the death of his friend, Gottschalk. Herr Gottschalk was taken ill in Rio Janeiro in June last. On the 5th of August he had yellow fever, from which, after a few trips into the interior, he recovered. On the 5th of September he recommenced his concerts, and on the 26th of November he was taken seriously ill. From that time till his death he gradually sank. He died on the 18th of December of an internal tumour. On the following day his remains were placed in a temporary resting place.

A correspondent of Dwight's Journal, writing from Berlin, says:—

"I have heard Mdme. Joachim twice at the same time that I heard her husband. She has a lovely voice, round and full, and she sings in such a pure, simple style, that it is a real delight to hear her. Not a superfluous note or grace, her style is almost severe in its simplicity. At one concert she sang Bach's 'Erbarme dich,' her husband playing the violin obbligato! Imagine it! She is a concert singer, and sings classical music entirely; I have heard her sing Handel, Schumann, Schubert, Bach, and Marcello. She has a very sweet face, lovely figure, and her bearing on the stage is just like her singing, and like the music she sings."

In another part of his letter we read:—

"I got a wreath, and for the second time made the attempt to find Mendelssohn's grave, and succeeded. His grave is covered with ivy—I enclose a leaf, which I gathered—and is next that of Fanny Hensel, who lies between her brother and husband, who died in 1861. His wife lies in the graveyard at Frankfort. A fresh wreath was lying on Fanny Hensel's grave."

The Paris correspondent of the Telegraph wrote on Tuesday:—

"I have just received from St. Petersburgh a description of the medal of the first class of the Order of Merit, which has been presented to Madame Adelina Patti. The medal is surrounded by thirty-four large solitaires, surmounted by the Imperial crown in diamonds, and mounted in a magnificent diamond bracelet. The medal itself is of gold. On one side is the portrait of the Emperor, and on the other are engraved the words—'The Emperor of Russia wishing to give Mdme. Adelina Patti a proof of his high favour, and of his esteem for her incomparable talent, has conferred upon her the title of First Singer to the Court.' This mark of favour is the more gratifying as it was given spontaneously, prompted only by the good feeling of the Emperor. Madame Patti has already sung twenty-four consecutive times in the opera, besides in four concerts; and, in spite of the extreme cold, she is, as her admirers will be glad to learn, in excellent health."

The leading article in our present number is based upon the following which appeared in last week's Choir:—

"A meeting of the Restoration Committee was held a few days ago, at which, it may be fairly supposed, the unfinished condition of the great work of the restoration of the Cathedral, and the present financial position of the committee, was considered. It is, however, now known, that at this meeting a proposal was submitted from the Earl Dudley, offering to provide a sum of £10,000 to complete the work of restoration, upon the condition that for the time to come the Cathedral should be used exclusively for the celebration of religious services, and consequently that not any of the performances at the Triennial Festivals should again take place within its walls. In order that the committee may have ample time to consider this splendid offer, Earl Dudley has, we believe, left the final decision of the question until the next Restoration Committee meeting on the 21st of April. Although, musically speaking, and for the sake of the Charity in connection with the Festivals, there appears on the surface that a serious loss would be felt, still there are numbers who have hitherto supported the cause, who are inclined to think that the time has arrived when the Cathedral should not be used any more for these performances, and that the noble lord's munificent offer should be accepted. The restoration of the Cathedral is now fully completed, with the exception of the re-fitting of the choir, including a screen, the re-pavement of the building throughout, and the re-building and enlargement of the organ. The sum offered by Earl Dudley would, we believe, meet all these expenses; on the completion of which, the interior of Worcester Cathedral would be one of the most magnificent in the kingdom. The Earl has already been a munificent contributor to the Restoration Fund, having previously given £5,000 towards the re-edification of the tower, and £300 towards the Rev. R. Cattley's grand scheme of a clock and a peal of bells. The latter are now safely housed in the tower, and the inauguration will take place about Easter."

Mr Barry Sullivan has had an enthusiastic reception at the Royal Amphitheatre, Liverpool. Describing it, the Daily Post says:—"Merely regarded as a scene of enthusiasm, the reception of Mr. Barry Sullivan on Saturday night must live long in the memories of all who beheld it; followed as it was by, we do not hesitate to say, the finest representation of Hamlet seen on any stage for many years, the recollection of it can never be effaced. When Mr. Sullivan presented himself, the last figure—slight, sombre, and graceful—in the suit of the King, the audience literally rose and applauded vociferously for a period perhaps unprecedented on any similar occasion. After each act honours hardly less signal were enthusiastically paid. And when, after the tragedy, the curtain was raised and the Hamlet of the night crossed the stage, there was another great surge of the applauding throngs by whom the theatre was densely packed." Mr. Sullivan travelled from London by the five o'clock express on the previous evening, and narrowly escaped the perils of what might have been a most tragical accident. A little beyond Crewe some miscreant had placed a rail across the line. Fortunately, just before the express train came up, a man in the employ of the company walking along the line discovered the obstacle in time to signal the train to stop. Mr. Sullivan has played during the week to tremendous houses.

Dining-room in an old palace. In front, on the L., a little breakfast table well appointed; clock laid for two. On the R., chairs and work-table. Sofa against the wall. Windows at the back. Practicable door R., door L. Susan discovered.

Susan (holding a bill in her hand). Yes, Venice is a very nice place, and the Venetians very nice people, but they need not be in such a hurry for their money. Fifty pounds here, fifty pounds there, and a hundred somewhere else—altogether there must be a good deal owing (walks back towards table). And why does not Lord Walsingham come? Breakfast has been ready this quarter of an hour.

Enter Isabel, L.

Isabel. Have you sent for Lord Walsingham? (Susan hides the bill.)
Susan. Only this moment, ma'am.
Isabel. Very well.
Susan (aside, looking at the bill). I must show it to her.
Isabel. Susan.
Susan. Yes, ma'am.
Isabel. You are a very good girl, Susan, and it was really very kind of you to follow me here——
Susan. I have never been in service except with you, ma'am; so, directly I heard, ma'am, where you were I thought it was my duty——
Isabel. And I am very much obliged to you—but what is the matter? What confuses you—tell me what it is?
Susan. The fact is, ma'am——
Isabel. What is that paper you have in your hand?
Susan. It's a bill, ma'am.
Isabel. A bill?
Susan. I am sorry to tell you, ma'am, but several people have been here for money.
Isabel. For money. (Aside, smiling rather sadly.) It is true, I did not think of that. (Aloud.) Well, let me see it.
Susan. There it is, ma'am (gives her the bill); but there are a great many others, some of them, as far as I could make out, for very large sums.
Isabel. Where are they?
Susan. Here. (Gives bills.)
Isabel. Give them to me, give me them all. (Looking at the bills—aside.) In debt am I? I did not think of that when I sent back the money. However, I will write to my father. Never mind, Susan, I shall be able to pay them. (Enter Servant, bringing newspapers and letters, which she places on the table, and a letter which she hands to Isabel.) Ah, it is from the doctor.

(Exit Servant. (Isabel takes letter and reads it with emotion; when she has finished reading it she perceives that Susan has not left the room and that she seems to be waiting for something.)

Susan. I beg your pardon, ma'am, but I heard you say the letter was from the doctor; and that being the case I beg your pardon, but I——
Isabel (with much emotion). You wish to know?—— Susan. How Master George is?
Isabel. Master George is quite well. All the news is good. Very good, indeed.
Susan. Very good, indeed?
Isabel. Yes, Master George is quite well; and (with an effort and very rapidly) his papa, who for nearly a month was dangerously ill, is now perfectly recovered. That is what you wanted to know, Susan, was it not? I understand you, and there was no harm in your asking me.
Susan. Thank you, ma'am
Isabel. Very well, Susan, that will do. (Exit, Susan. A pause. Isabel casts her eyes slowly around her.) An hour's anger has brought me to this! Ah! Well, it is too late now!

Enter Walsingham.

Walsingham. Isabel!
Isabel. At last you have come.
Walsingham. Yes; I am a little late.

* This version is sanctioned by the authors and published with their approval, in conformity with the requirements of the International Copyright Act of 1852 (signed H. Meilhac, Ludovic Halévy. Paris, January, 26, 1870).

Isabel. Don't speak of it. (Goes to the table.)
Walsingham (also going to the table; they both sit down). Yes, I must speak of it. Do you think I should not have been here before if there had been nothing to detain me? I will tell you.
Isabel (uneasily). You will tell me?
Walsingham. Certainly! My mother has been here for the last three days.
Of course you did not know.
Isabel. I did know.
Walsingham. How could you?
Isabel. Do you not remember three days ago you were a little late as you were to-day? It was the first time, and there was a singular expression in your face. I could not resist it; and the moment you had left the house——
Walsingham (smiling). The moment I had left the house?
Isabel. Well! A young woman concealed in a gondola follows a young man in another gondola—what can be more Venetian than that? And that is how I discovered that your mother was at Venice.
Walsingham. You knew it, and you did not speak to me of it?
Isabel. I dared not. I was so frightened?
Walsingham. So frightened.
Isabel. Yes, indeed! I feel a little reassured now because I see you laugh, for I know you would not laugh if I had anything to fear.
Walsingham. And what was it you were afraid of?
Isabel. She hates me, does she not?
Walsingham. My mother is too fond of me to hate those who——
Isabel. Those who love you, why do you not say the word?
Walsingham. To hate those who love me——
Isabel. But she would like to separate us.
Walsingham. My mother means to pass a portion of the winter at Rome; and she hoped, she said, that I would accompany her there.
Isabel. Ah! And what did you say?
Walsingham. How can you doubt? My mother starts to-morrow morning, and she starts alone.
Isabel. Does she really?
Walsingham. Indeed she does.
Isabel. How will she start alone? What, then, are Sir John and Lady Lorimer, who came with her, going to do? Will they leave her?
Walsingham. Ah, you also know that Sir John is here?
Isabel. Yes, and Lady Lorimer too. Of course I know; (sadly) and why should I not confess it? I did hope, for a moment, that Lady Lorimer would, perhaps, come——
Walsingham. Isabel!
Isabel. But what does it matter after all provided you remain. All my life is centred in you now. I must not forget that, and I shall be happy as long as you do not forget it either.
Walsingham. Why say such things, Isabel? You know that I never shall forget it.
Isabel. Yes, I know it.
Walsingham (rising). Let us see what news there is from England. (Takes up newspaper from table; reads.) "Last night of the opera season. Doors open at eight, the performance will begin at half-past."
Isabel. We shall never have time to get there.
Walsingham. No; in the first place it is rather a long distance; and then this number of the Times is dated three days ago.
Isabel (getting up). And what was going on three days ago?
Walsingham. Let me see, "Irish Land Question." Do you care about that?
Isabel. Not much.
Walsingham. "Russians in Central Asia?"
Isabel. Not at all. Are there any new novels advertised? (Looking over Walsingham's shoulder, and reading.) "Romance and Reality," "Love or Marriage"——
Walsingham. What are they doing at the theatres? At Drury Lane, Formosa.
Isabel (quickly). What did they finish with at the Opera?
Walsingham. La Traviata.

(Their voices become sadder and sadder as they read, until at last Walsingham lets the paper fall from his hands. They remain silent for a moment, each reflecting, then look at one another.)

Walsingham. Well, Isabel?
Isabel. At least you do not regret it?
Walsingham. I?
Isabel. Tell me that you do not regret it.
Walsingham. How can I?
Isabel. You love me, do you not?
Walsingham. I adore you.

Enter Susan, R.

Susan. Oh, ma'am!
Isabel. What is it?
Susan. Sir John Lorimer, ma'am, and Lady Lorimer with him.
Isabel. Oh! (with joy.)

Enter Lady Lorimer.

(Lady L. and Isabel embrace affectionately.)

Lady L. Oh, my dear. [Exit Susan.

Isabel. How kind of you to come!

Lady L. Well, if Sir John had not consented to accompany me I really should have run away and come by myself. (They sit down together on the sofa.)

Walsingham (to Sir John). I am very much obliged to you for coming.

Sir John (aside). Do not thank me. I came to give you a message—which must be given at once.

Walsingham (aside). What message?

Sir John. Vivian arrived here this morning.

Walsingham. Vivian? Ah, now I understand why you allowed Lady Lorimer to come. If anything happens, Isabel, at least, will not be alone.

Sir John. Yes, I thought of that.

Walsingham. Vivian——

Sir John. Did you not expect?——

Walsingham. There are some things which are sure to happen, and of which, nevertheless, one scarcely ever thinks. (To himself, with a smile.) Death, for instance. (Going towards the two women.) What numbers of things you must have to say to one another.

Lady L. I should think so.

Walsingham. If you will allow us we will leave you together a little while to continue your conversation.

Isabel. You are going to your mother's?

Walsingham. Yes.

Isabel. But—— You will come back?

Walsingham. Of course. Sir John will come back for Lady Lorimer, and I shall return with him.

Isabel. Good-bye, then, for the present.

Walsingham. Yes, good-bye for the present, Lady Lorimer. (Bows to her. Aside to Sir John, who is waiting for him.) But if Lady Lorimer should tell her?

Sir John. Lady Lorimer does not know that Vivian is here.

Walsingham (returning to Isabel and almost unable to restrain his emotion). Good-bye!

Isabel. You will be back soon?

Walsingham. Yes, very soon. [Exeunt Walsingham and Sir John.

Isabel, Now sit down there (makes Lady L. sit down in an arm-chair), and tell me what is going on in London. (She takes a chair.)

Lady L. In London?

Isabel. My little boy?

Lady L. He is very well.

Isabel. You have seen him lately?

Lady L. Yes; just a week ago, the evening before I started, I saw him with his governess. I kissed him once for myself and I do not know how many times for you.

Isabel (kissing Lady Lorimer). Thank you, thank you! And Louisa?

Lady L. She was staying with her father, you know that?

Isabel. Yes, I know.

Lady L. As soon as it was quite certain that Mr. Vir——(correcting herself). As soon as it was quite certain that all danger was at an end, Louisa and your father left London and went down to Elmtree.

Isabel (coldly). Elmtree?

Lady L. Yes.

Isabel (after a pause). And me, what do they say about me?

Lady L. They say nothing about you.

Isabel. Nothing?

Lady L. Only fancy, it took place six weeks ago. During the first fortnight if you like—but don't be alarmed. There was a general understanding about it. It was considered good taste to defend you. And then Mr. Vivian's solicitor let something out, and it was soon known that when your dowry was forwarded to you here, you sent back the whole of the fifty thousand pounds by return of post.

Isabel. Was it not my duty? The money belonged not to me but to my child.

Lady L. However, you sent back fifty thousand pounds, and there are a great many women in this world—at all events, it had the best effect. After that even the most severe picked you, the others almost admired you. (Isabel looks at her in the face.) Courage is such a fine thing, and so rare.

Isabel. People were not too unmerciful with me then?

Lady L. No, no; and I dare say there was more than one who secretly envied you, for you are very happy here.

Isabel. Happy?

Lady L. Yes.

Isabel Certainly, I am happy (with a sort of terror), and, gracious heaven! what would become of me if I were not. (They both rise.)

Lady L. Forgive me; but you are really not quite so much to be pitied as you imagine. He loves you—no, you need not answer—I am sure he loves you. I could see that just this moment, when he left you.

Isabel. Yes, he loves me.

Lady L. Fancy Lord Walsingham! Who would ever have thought him capable of a serious passion.

Isabel. Why did I not marry him? I thought of that when you spoke of Elmtree. Do you remember—it is now five years ago?

Lady L. I remember.

Isabel. He also had proposed for me; and naturally, as it was Lord Walsingham, they did not even give themselves the trouble——However, if I had married him I should not be here now.

Lady L. (with an air of doubt). Oh, as for that——

Isabel. What do you say?

Lady L. Nothing at all.

Isabel. Yes, I heard you.

Enter Susan, much agitated.

Susan. Oh, ma'am, here is I——

Isabel. Good heavens, Susan! what is the matter? What has happened?

Susan. It's——(whispers to Isabel).

Isabel. Oh!

Susan. He's outside, ma'am.

Isabel. (to Lady Lorimer). Come, I beg of you ——

Lady L. What has happened, my dear?

Isabel (pointing to the door of her room). Go in there, I beg of you, and don't come out until I myself ask you to do so.

Lady L. Isabel, my dear Isabel!

Isabel. But don't go away—not on any account. I shall have need of you, I am sure. You promise me, don't you—you will stay? Do not abandon me.

Lady L. Certainly I will stay.

Isabel. Thank you (opening the door). Go in there, then, and wait for me. (Lady L. goes into the room.) Now, Susan. (Susan goes to the back, and Vivian appears, pale, emaciated, frightfully changed.) Is that you?

Vivian. It is I.

Isabel. I knew that you had been very ill, but I heard that afterwards, fortunately——

Vivian. Yes, I was nearly on the point of death, but I did not die. So, as soon as I had strength enough, having something to settle with you, I came here.

Isabel. Something to settle?

Vivian. Yes, it is about——(he staggers and supports himself with the back of a chair. Isabel is going towards him. He stops her by a gesture.) It is nothing. I beg your pardon, I am still very——my throat is on fire—I can scarcely speak—some water.

Isabel. Water. (She goes to the table, pours out some water into one of two glasses, and goes towards her husband with it. He has noticed that the table is laid for two. Points it out to Isabel, and pushes away the glass. Isabel falls back in despair, and replaces the glass on the table.) Gracious heavens!

Vivian. It's about your money.

Isabel. My money?

Vivian. Yes, your dowry. You sent it back to me, you must take it again.

I do not wish you to be exposed to——

Isabel. You have had my answer.

Vivian. I know, I know. Nevertheless——

Isabel. No, I tell you I will not have it.

Vivian. Will you compel me to give you another reason? (Isabel looks at him with a terrified air.) I will not allow my son to touch a farthing of that money. I will not allow him—do you understand me?

Isabel. Oh!

Vivian. And in order that you should hear this from no one else I came myself, and I leave you this. (He places a large sealed envelope on the table, and makes a step towards the door.)

Isabel. You are going away?

Vivian. Yes, now that everything is arranged as I desired.

Isabel. You are going to fight?

Vivian. Of course I am going to fight, and I can assure you that if I had had strength enough to come before——you don't doubt me, I suppose?

Isabel. A duel—on account of me? Two men try to kill one another on my account? It is impossible! Only think! (He is about to leave the room. She stops him.) You shall not fight!—A man like you fight about a woman like me. You always had far too high an opinion of me. I saw it, but I said nothing; I was wrong. But I will not let you go so far as to kill a man. No, I will not—I will not. I do not forget what I have done, gracious heaven! no. I might well say that I did it in a moment of madness. That scene with Louisa—ah! I knew now how wrong I was, and I implore forgiveness for it. However, if it had not been for that scene I never should have——but I will not attempt to defend myself; you must have your revenge. Yes, I understand that; avenge yourself then, but in some other way. As for a duel, it shall not be. Is there no other way of satisfying your honour?

Vivian. My honour?

Isabel. The opinion of the world! But you know very well whatever you may do, the world will never doubt your courage.

Digitized by Google

Vivian. Oh, you make a great mistake if you think that I am troubling myself about my honour, or that I care one atom what the world may think of your fault or of my vengeance. I loved you; you betrayed me because you loved another man, and I am going to see whether I can kill that man. That is all. It is plain enough I think. (He goes towards the door.)

Isabel. No, no! I will not have it. I alone am guilty; crush me, but me alone. (She clings to him, he endeavours to disengage himself.)

Vivian. Leave me!

Isabel. What vengeance do you require? Do you wish me to disappear from the face of the earth? I do not speak of dying, I should not have courage enough. But there are convents here—close by there is one. Often, as I have passed before it, I have looked at the gate. I can knock and ask for admittance. You can take me there yourself. The gate will close upon me, and never, never again, will you hear of the woman who has offended you.

Vivian (still trying to disengage himself). Come, I have told you.

Isabel. Is that not enough, gracious heaven! If not, think of some other punishment. I will submit to anything. Yes, to anything, only do not condemn me to live with the horrible thought that a man has perished on my account.

Vivian (endeavouring to unclasp Isabel's fingers). This is all useless.

Isabel. Pity! mercy!

Vivian. No.

Isabel. Henry!

Vivian (seeking more violently to get rid of her). Oh

Isabel (hysterically). Don't go. I will love you for ever!

Vivian. Oh! oh! (Isabel faints, still holding her husband by the hands. He makes a few steps, unable to get rid of her. At last he manages to unclasp her fingers, when she falls back on the sofa. Vivian is about to leave the room, but having reached the back of the stage, he stops, returns, looks on the inanimate figure of Isabel, and for a moment remains bewildered. Lady Larrimer comes from the inner room, then Vivian, without saying a word, points to Isobel, and exit.)

Lady L. Isabel, Isabel!

Isobel (slowly recovering consciousness, and opening her eyes). Where is he?

Lady L. Gone.

Isobel. Gone?

Lady L. Calm yourself.

Isobel (rising). He has gone out to fight. (Lady L. looks at her inquiringly.) He told me so.

Lady L. Oh!

Isobel. I must go; I must prevent them.

Lady. L. Go where? you do not know.

Isobel. I will find out.

Lady L. And even if you were to find out? No—remain here. I understand how. Sir John knew all about it, and wished me to be with you. He was right.

Isobel. I implore you—let me go!

Lady L. No, I will not let you leave the room (she makes her sit down on a chair).

Isobel. What am I to do, then?

Lady L. Wait. Sir John will come and tell us.

Isobel. Wait?

Lady L. Yes.

Isobel. Oh!

Lady L. It is only a duel after all, and how many duels end in nothing.

Isobel. Oh! not this one. (As if struck by an idea.) Ah! (she rises).

Lady L. What is it?

Isobel (walking in an agitated manner about the room). He will not defend himself, I know he will not. Why did I not say just now that he would not defend himself? That's what I should have said. If I had said that there would have been no duel (finding a chair in her way she takes hold of it, and drags it mechanically after her).

Lady L. Isabel!

Isobel (sinking into the chair, Lady L. goes down on her knees before Isobel and embraces her). Gracious heavens! To be here useless, waiting and unable to do anything but wait. (A dead silence, prolonged as much as possible.) Do you remember three months ago one night we were at the play together, with Mrs. Danvers and Lady Langton? We had a large box just over the stage, and I felt so happy. I can't tell why, but I remember saying to myself, between the acts, that I felt so happy, and that I had never amused myself so much before. You remember? It was about three months ago.

Lady L. Yes, quite well.

Isobel. Sir John has not come. Perhaps the duel has been stopped. (Again a prolonged silence.) Ah, listen!

Lady L. I hear nothing.

Isobel. Yes, some one is coming. (She suddenly jumps up.) I heard plainly enough. (Enter Sir John, very pale.) Gracious heaven! I dare not ask. (To Sir John.) My husband?

Sir John. Your husband is safe——

Isobel. And?——(Sir John makes no answer). He is dead?

Sir John. No; only wounded, but——

Isobel. But?——

Sir John. Wounded dangerously.

Isobel. Very well, I will go——

Sir John. No, you cannot.

Isobel. What do you mean by "cannot"? Ah! if you think anything on earth can prevent me——

Sir John (stopping her). His mother is with him.

Isobel. His mother?

Sir John. Yes.

Isobel. Ah, you are right. If his mother is there—of course—I cannot. (She staggers. Lady L. pushes forward a chair, Isabel sinks exhausted into it.) That is quite right.

END OF ACT IV.

ACT V.

Same scene as in Act III. Room presents a deserted aspect. No flowers, no flower-pots in the stands. No music on the piano. Time, evening. On the table a lighted lamp. George and his Governess discovered. The Governess (seated near the table, is reading with George). "The prince reached the gate; as soon as he touched it with the talisman it opened of itself, and he ran into the unknown land to look for the princess. After seeking her everywhere for two years he had the happiness to find her, and brought her home with him."

George. And why did the prince take so much trouble to find her?

Governess. Because he was very fond of her.

George. And he did find her at last?

Governess. Yes, I have just told you, "after looking for her everywhere for two years he had the happiness"——

George. I say—if you don't mind; but you must not say anything about it to any one——

Governess. If I don't mind?

George. If you don't mind we will start together, and we will go and look for mamma all over the world. (The Governess kisses the child.)

Enter a Servant.

Servant. Miss Simpson——

Governess. What is it?

Servant. Susan, Mrs. Vivian's maid.

Governess. Mrs. Vivian's maid?

Servant. Yes, she is outside. She wishes to see Master George.

Governess. Really! I don't know whether I ought to allow it.

Servant. She would only stay one minute.

Governess. I don't think I can allow it. (With some emotion.) On the other hand I don't know whether I ought——

Enter Susan. (She stops at the back of the stage).

Susan. Oh, Miss Simpson, I beg of you! [Exit Servant.

George (running up to Susan). It's Susan!

Susan. Did you know me, Master George?

George. I should think so. I knew you directly.

Susan. What a big boy you have grown.

George. It's such a long time since I saw you.

Susan. Yes, a long time, more than six months.

George. Why did you go away?

Susan. Why?

George. And where's mamma?

Susan. Oh! (a pause.)

Enter Vivian, R.

Vivian (to the Governess). Take George away, Miss Simpson. (He kisses his son.)

Governess. I hope, Mr. Vivian, I did nothing wrong?

Vivian. I do not reproach you. Please take George away.

[Exit Governess, R, with the child.

Susan. I beg your pardon, sir.

Vivian. Never mind, never mind. How long have you been in London?

Susan. Since yesterday.

Vivian. And are you——alone.

Susan. No, sir. Miss Louisa is here also, with Mr. Royston and——

Vivian. And?

Susan. Yes, sir.

Vivian (to himself). Close to me, in London!

Susan. Oh, we are only passing through. We start to-night for Paris, and from Paris to the south of France. The doctors said it was absolutely necessary.

Vivian. The doctors?

Susan. Yes, sir. We stopped here for a consultation, and I thought that if mistress could hear how Master George was, that would do her more good than anything the doctors could think of. So I came without saying anything to anyone.

Vivian. Is she in danger, Susan?
Susan. Yes, sir.
Vivian. Not in danger of dying, however, not in danger of dying?
Susan. I don't think so.
Vivian. You do not think so?
Susan. I was very much more frightened—of course I was very much more frightened the day, sir, when you—— (she pauses).
Vivian. Speak, Susan; pray tell me what you have to say.
Susan. I certainly thought then that all was over. It lasted three days. Lady Lorimer and myself did all we could for her, but every moment we thought would be the last. After these three days Miss Louisa arrived. Mistress did not know her at first, but at last she recognized her, and Miss Louisa took her in her arms, and mistress began to weep, and they both wept without saying a word. From that time mistress began to improve, and soon afterwards we started for Devonshire, and went to stay with Mr. Royston at Elmtree.
Vivian. And once in Devonshire she got better and better?
Susan. Yes, for the first two months she seemed to do so, but she was very pale and smiled so sadly when she did smile. Ah, sir, if you had only seen her, in her common black dress, her, who formerly——
Vivian (interrupting her). Formerly what?
Susan. Then she was always with the poor, with the sick; at last what might have been expected took place. After passing several nights by the side of a poor old woman whose life she saved, she, in her turn, fell ill, and when she wished to rise from her bed, it was impossible. Then the doctors came. Some recommended one thing, some another, and at last she was advised to go to London, and the London doctors, as I just told you, sir, say she must go to the south of France.

Enter Servant.

Servant. Miss Royston, sir.
Vivian. Louisa!
Susan. Ah, sir, if Miss Louisa has come, mistress must——
Vivian. What do you say?
Susan. Mistress must be very ill indeed.
Vivian (pointing to the door). That way—you will find George. You can wish him good-bye. There, be quick! [Exit Susan, r.
(Vivian has made a sign to the servant, who has gone out at the back.)

Enter Louisa.

Louisa. The child!
Vivian. Louisa!
Louisa. Her child! You cannot object to her seeing her child before she dies?
Vivian. Before what?
Louisa. Before she dies.
Vivian. Oh!
Louisa. You do not answer me.
Vivian. George is in there. (He rings the bell.) He will come directly. You shall take him with you.
Louisa. I shall take him with me?
Vivian. Is not that what you asked?
Louisa. Yes; that is what I asked, but that is not what I hoped you would answer.
Vivian. What do you desire, then?
Louisa. Her child! It would be too much to ask you, perhaps, but I hoped that you would bring him yourself—that you would see her—that you would even utter a word of forgiveness.
Vivian. Of forgiveness?
Louisa. Henry!
Vivian. Oh, if that is what you wish!
Louisa. She is dying.
Vivian. Dying! Oh, Louisa! Oh if it were possible! My heart is suffering from the most frightful torture imaginable. If by giving my life I could save hers, I certainly would give it without hesitation. I tell the truth when I say that; I should tell a falsehood if I said I forgave her.
Louisa. It is by your hand that she dies.
Vivian. By my hand?
Louisa. Yes, by yours. You avenged yourself. Very well. But after vengeance comes forgiveness.
Vivian. I cannot!
Louisa. Has not the expiation been painful enough? Think of what she has suffered.
Vivian. What she has suffered? Look around you! Do you see the house deserted, the child abandoned? Look, consider, and tell me which of the two, she or myself, seems to have suffered?
Louisa. She longs to see you, and she is dying!
Vivian. Do you wish me to tell a falsehood? If that is all, I will do what you ask me. I can say that I forgive her, though there is no forgiveness in my heart. But if you require more than that—no, it is impossible! The wound was too severe—my grief is too profound.
Louisa. A greater injury than yours has been forgiven, nevertheless.
Vivian. A greater injury than mine?
Louisa. A greater injury than yours.
Vivian. Of whom are you speaking?
Louisa. It is your fault if I evoke such recollections. I speak of that mother——
Vivian. Louisa!
Louisa, Whose son you killed.
Vivian. Oh!
Louisa. She saw that Isabel was dying. And Isabel, dying as she is, begged that mother to forgive her, and to forgive you.
Vivian. And did she grant her forgiveness?
Louisa. She did.
Vivian. It is untrue!
Louisa. She swore to heaven that she forgave you both.
Vivian (after a pause.) What faith you women must have to perform such miracles!
Louisa. Henry!
Vivian. Take the child—take him away at once.

Enter Royston.

Louisa. Papa!
Vivian. You, Mr. Royston?
Royston. She would come.
Louisa. Isabel?
Royston. She is outside. [Exit Louisa.] (To Vivian.) You cannot refuse to see her. She has only come here to die. (Isabel appears at the back supported by Louisa. She takes a few steps, and sinks on her knees. Royston takes a step towards her to raise her from the ground.)
Isabel. No, papa, not you. (Vivian rushes towards her, raises her up, and takes her in his arms.)
Vivian. Oh, Isabel, Isabel!
Isabel. Thank you, thank you. (Isabel is now on the sofa, Vivian on his knees by her side.)
Isabel (looking around her). At home again, at home!
Vivian. Yes, at home, Isabel, at home! And you will not die, and you will remain here, now, for ever.
Isabel (smiling). For ever!
Vivian. Isabel, my Isabel!
Isabel. You pardon me, do you not?
Vivian. Yes, yes, I forgive you, and you shall not die.
Isabel. Oh, as for that!——where is my child, bring me my child.
Vivian. Yes, I will go for him.
Isabel. Directly, and bring him to me yourself.

[Exit Vivian, and immediately afterwards returns with George.

George (with delight). Mamma!
Isabel. George, my child! (She takes him in her arms and embraces him.)
George. Now you have come back.
Isabel. Yes, but not for very long, George; I think not. Let me kiss you again, once more (embraces her son several times). And now, Louisa come here, Louisa. (She places George in Louisa's arms.) He is yours, I give him to you.
Louisa. Isabel!
Isabel. Yes, yours; and he also (pointing to Vivian). Take care of them both. Once before in this very place I said the same thing to you. Forgive me!
Louisa. Oh!
Vivian. You will not die, it is impossible.
Isabel. Not die! (Looking around her.) It would be a pity not to do so now.
Royston. My darling!
Isabel. Never mind, poor papa. What had I a right to expect? That I should die deserted in despair! Instead of that I die in the midst of those who love me, calm and happy.
Vivian. No, it is not you who require forgiveness; it is I—I who did not sufficiently take care——
Isabel. You, why should you be forgiven? For having loved me too much? (Pointing to Louisa and Royston.) That has been my misfortune, you have all been too fond of me.
Louisa. Isabel?
Isabel. And that is why I am dying, and that is why I am dying so peacefully. (Sighing.) Oh!
All (thanking her dead). Isabel!
Isabel (raising her head). Louisa, where are you, Louisa? Come here; I have something to tell you. When I am dead you must take this dress off. I don't like this black dress—no. You will find among my ball dresses a white one. The skirt is covered all over with little rosebuds. Let me wear it again. You will see how nice I shall look, and you will all think of the Isabel whom you loved so much and who was so happy in former days.
Vivian. Ah!
Isabel. Yes, always the same! (To George.) My dear little boy! You forgive me, do you not? Isabel, poor Isabel.
All. Oh!

END.

The fact that the duet rises to a greater pitch of expression than the trio, shows that the one must be differently sung from the other. The difference in style of delivery must extend even to the chief subject which is common to both pieces. In the case of the duet, this must have more accentuation and variety, while in the trio, though the tempo is the same, the expression must be more even.

No information is extant by which we can determine the time at which this finale was composed. The manuscript has the appearance of belonging to about the date 1800. That it was written before Leonora seems to follow from the fact of the parallelism between the two; for it is impossible to believe that Beethoven would have used a melody from Leonora in a later work.

It is also impossible to help remarking, how naturally the words of the finale: "Nie war ich so froh wie heute," suit that melody, while in the duet the unusual repetition of the half of the second word: "O namen-namen-lose Freude," goes against the fact of any original connection between the words and the music.

IX. DOTS AND STROKES.

On looking through the original editions of Beethoven's works, and comparing them with recent editions, it will be observed that the former contain two marks of staccato, namely, both points and strokes; while in the latter only points, or only strokes, are used, showing that in the later editions, the distinction between the two modes of marking has been given up, as if it were not necessary for the understanding or the exact execution of Beethoven's music. The truth of this conclusion will depend upon whether Beethoven himself intended any difference between points and strokes, and wished to indicate a different mode of execution, in each case. We propose to examine this point a little in detail.

In the library of the Gesellschaft der Musik-Freunde, at Vienna, there is a large collection of ancient manuscript orchestral parts, which have been looked through and corrected by Beethoven himself. These parts, which are older than any printed copies, and have been very much used, were originally in Beethoven's possession, and were sold by auction with the rest of his musical remains (see No. 190, &c. of the Auction Catalogue, and the Deutsche Musikzeitung, 7th July 1862)

Beethoven looked very sharply after his parts. In one of the first violin parts just mentioned, some one has, in two places, put this mark: X X. To the first of these, Beethoven has marked with red pencil, in his own large writing:—"N.B.—These are the X's of an ass who has left his mark here,"—and at the second one: "This X is also by an ass." The "ass," whoever he was, has preserved his incognito.

But to return to the correction. Many of them refer to the marks of Lowing and the like. In one of the first violin parts of the 7th Symphony, the copyist has written a passage in the second movement as follows:—

on which Beethoven has altered the dots above the quavers into strokes, leaving the passage as follows:—

with a mark in the margin calling attention to the alteration, probably for the information of some one who was assisting him. The same thing occurs in the viola part at the 5th and 6th bars of the same movement, where the copyist has—which Beethoven has altered to—with X!! in the margin.

Further on, beginning at bar No. 19, the copyist has written—which Beethoven has corrected to—placing in the margin ⌣ and "+ — take away thn 11." Similar changes are to be found in other passages, and other parts.

In a letter of 1825 to Carl Holz, who had undertaken to correct a copy of the quartet in A minor, recently finished, Beethoven says: "Where a dot stands ever a note, it must not be changed into a stroke, and the reverse—is by no means the same as ."

From these examples it is evident that as early as the year 1813, when the seventh Symphony was first performed, Beethoven made a difference between points and strokes. I am not in a position to show that it was the case before that time, but there is no reason to doubt it.

The question now comes—What difference in value did Beethoven attach to these different signs? He must have understood them as he had been taught to understand them, and his interpretation could hardly have been other than that in use at the time in Vienna and elsewhere. To ascertain what this was it will be advisable to consult such works as had at that time a general authority, or were written by persons living in Vienna, and standing in a close relation to Beethoven. [G.]

Our friend Watson, for reasons best known to himself, as-calls the Beethoven Festival scheme with his sharpest satire. Hear him:—

"It is reported that Dr. R. Ogden Doremus, the President-Vice-President the concentrated essence and the nitrous-gaseous principle of the Beethoven Festival, will not move from Union Place, next May. This stationary—'more' is, in some way, remotely connected with the Beethoven Festival. Only last week an agitating report was current, that a body had been found exhibiting evident marks of neglect or something worse—some said it was poisoned, others that it had been 'burked,' and that it had been sent to Dr. Doremus for musico-chemico analysis. A few of the oldest inhabitants, it is said, recognized the corpse as that of one Beethoven, which, they said, had of late been needlessly disinterred. We believe this report to be altogether unfounded, as Mr. P. S. Gilmore, the great Jubilee-Festivalist, was in New York during the past week, searching with the aid of a powerful magnifying glass, but could find no signs of that body. Several of our wealthiest and most-influential citizens were seen last week to move their fingers from their breeches pockets, and place them upon their noses. The 'move' was received as a certain indication that the treasurer of the Beethoven Festival had been about. The one hundred directors of the Beethoven Centennial Festival have given our representative historical painter, William H. Powell, an order for a great cartoon, in honour of the occasion. It is to be allegorical and apocryphal, and will represent Apollo strident, one foot resting upon the Crystal Palace, London, and the other on the Coliseum, Boston. Apollo will be playing on the harp of a thousand strings, blowing a trumpet at the same time; while Beethoven, astride on his shoulders, will wave the American flag. Mascabenetts will be represented as a forlorn damsel, sitting on Plymouth Rock, with dishevelled hair, wringing her hands, while Gilmore, weeping, applies some Eau-de Cologne to her nose. The effect will be fine, and the application as clear as mud. Our representative composer, George F. Bristow, having received an order to write a Grand Centennial Overture, has, after mature consideration, arrived at a pause, before the beginning of the overture. He feels certain that at this rate, the work will be completed in time for the Festival. The price is put down among the minor expenses at 5,000 dollars, a sum which will be hardly noticed in the aggregate of expenses."

THE Duke of Saxe-Coburg has named M. Eugene Ketterer, a Chevalier of the Order of Saxe-Ernestine.

The Musical World.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1870.

A WANDERING MÉNÉSTREL.

A CERTAIN Monsieur Ernest David has thought it worth while to write a series of articles in Le Ménéstrel, based upon Dr. Burney's Travels in France and Italy. We are not going to quarrel with him for doing so, being content simply to regret that he knows no better. But in his last article, Monsieur Ernest David goes out of his way to make some sharp reflections upon English music and musicians. Here, of course, it is our duty to interfere, and we discharge our duty none the less readily because Monsieur Ernest David has written himself down an ass. Here are the lines between which long ears are visible:—

"Burney me paraît d'une naïveté adorable avec ses jeunes compositeurs anglais et sa musique anglaise. Qui donc les connaît? et, sondés et connus, les appelle-t-on ces fameux musiciens anglais? Duquel d'entre eux le nom a-t-il jamais traversé le détroit? Et la musique anglaise! quel est son genre, son caractère, son cachet? Dans quelle œuvre la trouve-t-on? Certainement Tallis, Purcell, Arne, Burney lui-même ont écrit d'assez bonnes choses pour l'église, mais on ne les connaît qu'en Angleterre. La véritable musique anglaise n'existe que dans les glees, les catches, les gigues et les chansons; je ne la trouve pas hors de là. Car il est impossible de dire que la musique de Handel est anglaise; autant vaudrait soutenir que lui-même était anglais! A ce compte-là Haydn serait anglais parce qu'il a écrit douze symphonies à Londres! Et Weber aussi à cause de son Oberon représenté à Londres et son ouverture de Jubel qui finit par le God save! Et encore Mendelssohn qui a terminé sa troisième symphonie en la mineur par le développement d'un thème anglais! Ces deux productions de ces grands compositeurs, au surplus, ne sont pas leurs meilleures; ils ont voulu caresser la faible oreille britannique et n'ont fait que gâter leur inspiration. Il ont sacrifié à la nationalité! C'est très-beau la nationalité, mais pas en cas pareil. Nos chers voisins ont fait ce qu'ils ont pu pour s'approprier Handel; il ont même été jusqu'à dénaturer son nom et son prénom (qu'on me passe cette expression!) en l'écrivant Handel au lieu de Hændel en véritable orthographe. Mais malgré tous leurs efforts ils n'ont jamais pu réussir à lui enlever sa nationalité, ni faire de l'Angleterre un pays musical."

It is quite unnecessary to refute this egregious nonsense for the behoof of Englishmen. Having read to the end—if, indeed, they can get so far, without going into convulsions—our compatriots will put Monsieur Ernest David among the most remarkable examples of Frenchmen who know nothing outside France, and straightway forget all about him. But as Monsieur Ernest David may himself read these lines, and may not be beyond the hope of perceiving some glimmer of truth anent England and the English, we dwell upon his remarks for a moment. Monsieur Ernest David, looking across the Channel with disdain and incredulity, asks—"Where is English music, and where are English musicians?" Monsieur Ernest David knows nothing of either. Is this presumptive evidence that neither exists? We might think so if it did not immediately appear how many things are to moderately-informed people which are not to Monsieur Ernest David. For example, our Gallic friend does not know that Handel's oratorios were written in the English school, and, for the most part, remain English property, so far as performance goes. He does not know that "le God save" is the Prussian national melody, on which account it appears in Weber's Jubilee overture. And he does not know that the finale of Mendelssohn's A minor symphony is innocent of a Scotch, much more of an English theme. It may be, therefore, that English music and musicians exist without being known to Monsieur Ernest David. What comfort there is in the thought! How freely we breathe again! Au revoir, Monsieur Ernest David!

—o—

IN consideration of the genuine success of La Bohémienne (The Bohemian Girl), at the Théâtre Lyrique, in Paris—a success which has actually prevented that establishment from closing its doors—Mr. Balfe, the composer, has received the decoration of the "Legion of Honour." Such a decoration his thousands of admirers in "Old England" have long ago affectionately bestowed upon him—from their hearts. Mr. Balfe has now got it in ribaud, from a magnanimous foreign nation, which, having, at present, but little original music of its own to boast of, thus gracefully expresses its sense of the possession of true musical genius by an Englishman.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

More information has come to hand respecting the "Proverbs" by Haydn, which will soon be published at Munich. They are six in number, and run as thus:—"Tout commencement est difficile." "Qui saute haut saute mal." "Qui se ressemble s'assemble." "A chacun son bien." Trop et trop peu ne valent rien." "Finis coronat opus." The last but two is highly spoken of for its ingenuity, each of the four parts being in a different rhythm. These interesting trifles now belong to a Father Kaim, and were written by Haydn at the Monastery of Ochsenhausen, where Haydn broke his journey from England.

After twenty-three years of service, M. Strauss retired from the post of purveyor of dance music to the French Court, with the red ribbon and cross of the Legion. M. Strauss's decoration seems to have turned his head. At a dinner given a few days since he harangued his orchestra as though mounted on a veritable cheval de bataille. "Let me remind you," said the new knight, "of the words of a king of France. Each soldier carries his marshal's bâton in his knapsack? I address myself to you, young guard; each of you has also his marshal's bâton in the case of his violin. The cross which I wear to-day marks a fact of great importance, an event." Well might the reporter call the speaker "Le Général Strauss." We should like to know, however, the precise time in the evening when the oration was delivered.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

Mr. Aguilar's Soirée d'invitation took place on Thursday evening week, when the following programme was gone through:—Solo, Piano, "Bolero," Aguilar (Mr. Aguilar); Song, "The Bird and the Maiden," Spohr (Miss Grace Aguilar); Duet, Clarionet and Piano, Andante and Rondo from Sonata in E flat, Weber (Mr. Lazarus and Mr. Aguilar); Song, "Mandolinata," Paladilhe (Miss Ferrari); Song, "The Ferry Boat," Aguilar (Mr. Desmond L. Ryan); Solo, Piano, Fantasia on Il Trovatore, Gottschalk (Miss Grace Aguilar); Song, "Eiley Mavourneen," Benedict (Mr. Frank Elmore); Songs, "Appeal," "In a wood on a windy day," Aguilar (Miss Grace Linde); Solo, Clarionet, Fantasia on Der Freischütz (Mr. Lazarus), "Alone," Aguilar (Miss Alice Ogle); Solo, Piano, Fantasia on Faust, Aguilar (Mr. Aguilar); Duet, "The Invitation," Glover (The Misses Ferrari); Song, "If Doughty Deeds," Sullivan (Mr. Desmond L. Ryan); Solo, Piano, "March of the 99th," Aguilar (Mr. Aguilar).

Miss Grace Aguilar accompanied the vocal music on the pianoforte.

Brixton.—There has been no lack of really good music in this quietly fashionable and out-of-the-way southern suburb of late. Until the present season, indeed, the Amateur Musical Society held a complete monopoly of the local patronage, but this winter, encouraged by the growing taste for classical music, two enterprising rivals have arisen, one of whom, Mr. Ridley Prentice, has succeeded in establishing a series of strictly classical chamber concerts, held in the same building; while to those of lighter tastes, and who prefer choral to instrumental music, Mr. W. Lemare, the director of the new Brixton Choral Society appeals, and does his best to enlist support by performing works of standard merit. This competition has had beneficial results in many ways. The advent of Mr. Prentice and Mr. Lemare has stimulated the old amateurs to increased exertions, and at the same time that the number of their subscribers has not fallen off in the least, neither of the former have had cause to complain of a want of support; and the Brixton concert-goers have the benefit of hearing every month, without the inconveniences attending a journey to town, very superior performances of orchestral, chamber, and choral works. Within a fortnight three of these concerts have taken place in the elegant room called the Angell Town Institution. Speaking them in chronological order, the first (4th inst.) was a Brixton Amateur Concert, rendered especially interesting by a performance of Haydn's symphony, No. 7, in D, in the interpretation of which the band gave many evidences of careful training. The programme, besides, included an overture, a march, and an operatic selection (on Rigoletto), in which there were some choice bits of solo playing; and Miss Annie Stocken played Weber's pianoforte sonata, Op. 24. Closely following this concert came the last but one of Mr. Prentice's series, when the works presented were Mozart's string quintet, in G (oboe, No. 3; Beethoven's Sonata Appassionata; Prelude and Gavotte, in G (Suite 6), J. S. Bach, for violoncello; and Haydn's string quartet, in D minor. Messrs. Weist Hill, F. Amor, W. H. Hann, S. Webb, Prentice, and W. Pettit, took part in the above selection, and the concert was one of uniform excellence. The Lusitanian Glee Club, Miss Banks, and Mr. W. H. Hillier, lent their aid in the vocal department. Last Monday the Choral Society gave a concert (the third of the season), and signalized itself by first performing in the metropolis Mr. Arthur S. Sullivan's much admired oratorio, The Prodigal Son. The choral parts of the work were rendered with admirable effect by the choir, numbering about 100 good and well tutored voices, and the artists entrusted with the solos were Miss Katherine Poynts, Miss Newton, Mr. Harley Vinning, and Mr. Stedman. This last gentleman, who is, we believe, an amateur, sang the tenor music with a commendable infusion of taste, but his voice evidenced tremulousness all the evening. The others acquitted themselves to perfect satisfaction; but the work, as a whole, owing, perhaps, to the absence of orchestral accompaniments, met with no great amount of appreciation. Mr. Lemare conducted, and there was an exceedingly full audience.—W. H. P.

HERR JOACHIM AND MADAME SCHUMANN.

The following comparison between these artists appeared recently in the Birmingham Daily Post. Of its truth we leave our readers to judge for themselves:—

"The former has long been acknowledged by every nation in Europe as the foremost violinist of the day; the lady's fame in this country is of more recent growth, but already she ranks among our best pianists; and even those who turn a deaf ear to the charm of her deceased husband's music freely recognize the rare executive talent of Madame Schumann. Beyond the perfection of their technical skill, their earnestness, intelligence, and general musical culture, the two artists have not much in common. Herr Joachim, with all his versatility and intensity, being as essentially phlegmatic and reserved as Madame Schumann is ardent and enthusiastic. In the fiery C minor sonata, this distinction between the two players was very conspicuous. Madame Schumann's performance, in the first and last movements more particularly, was marked by a spirit and abandon which frequently bordered on exaggeration, whilst Herr Joachim's playing, though never wanting in true feeling, exhibited a reserve and moderation which stamped the thorough artist. In the merely mechanical qualities of their performance the same difference was observable. Herr Joachim's playing being as faultlessly easy, as that of Mdme. Schumann was successfully laboured. The latter may be said to have struck fire from her audience repeatedly, but the former contrived to keep his hearers in a steady and continuous glow. And with slight modification this remark will apply to all their subsequent performances."

We regret to hear that Mr. C. G. Watkin Hill, a son of the late Mr. F. Hill, of the once famous music publishing firm of Monzani and Hill, is in a destitute condition, and suffering from an incurable disease of the most painful description, which totally precludes him from following his profession as an artist and portrait painter. A few friends who have long known him have made an appeal for pecuniary assistance, which we trust will meet with hearty response. Mr. Charles Hodgson, of the firm of Chalon & Hodgson, pianoforte makers, Oxford Street, will gladly receive and take charge of any donations for the relief of Mr. Hill.

Monday Popular Concerts.—On Monday night, Madame Schumann made her first appearance for the season, and played Beethoven's sonata in D minor, Op. 31, in a manner peculiarly her own. She was twice enthusiastically called back at the end of her performance. She also played, with Herr Joachim, the same composer's sonata in A major, Op. 30. Schumann's laboured quartet in F major (of which the slow movement offers the finest existing specimen of "Brummagem Beethoven") began the concert. Now that Mr. Chappell has joined hands with Mr. Manns of the Crystal Palace, we may hope to be speedily Schumannized to a wish. The most interesting instrumental feature of the programme was Beethoven's trio in G, for violin, viola, and violoncello, splendidly played by Joachim, Straus, and Piatti. The singing of Herr Stockhausen, in songs by Schubert, Schumann, and Handel, was as near perfection as possible. Being encored in Schumann's "Widmung," he sang another Lied by that composer.

A BRIEF DIALOGUE.

Bodger. I heard ——— ——— to-night. I suppose, Jenny, it is allowed to celebrate "virtuoso" to play wrong notes.

Jenny Bodger. Yes, of course, papa, if they only play them with expression.

PROVINCIAL.

MALVERN.—We condense as follows from the Malvern Advertiser:—

"The first concert in connection with the Holy Trinity Choral Society was given on Tuesday evening last, at the Morris School Room, Newtelde's 'Rule, Britannia' was well rendered. Mr. Bedarick's 'Liquid Gem' was slightly marred by an unfortunate tendency to 'read' indistinctly. 'The Blue Bells of Scotland' was well rendered. 'The Canadian Boat Song'—as given by Messrs. Resarick, Vaughan, and Ividge water—was extremely effective. Miss Meegan's 'Floating on the Wind' was good, but might be improved by less assumption of professional airs. Mr. Dailey's 'Yesterday' was given with much taste. 'The March of the Men of Harlech' was rendered in a manner to give satisfaction to all. The first encore of the evening was won by Mr. Vaughan for his rendering of 'Madeline.' Master S. Morgan and Master W. H. Smith in 'Under the willow she's sleeping' and 'Softly falls the moonlight' showed great promise. Stirling's gem, 'The Dream,' was certainly the success of the evening. As conductor Mr. W. Higley deserves great praise, as the efficiency of the society tends to show."

WEYMOUTH.—In the Southern Times we find a long account of Mr. T. Avant's concert, at which Madame Rudersdorff, Mdlle. Drasdil, Mr. Montem Smith, and Herr Carl Stepan were the vocalists. The bad weather, notwithstanding the attraction, caused the room to be but scantily filled. Those present, however, were well pleased. The Southern Times writes as follows about the performance of a trio by Signor Randegger:—

"The first part of the programme concluded with the trio, 'I Naviganti' ('The Mariners'), sung by Madame Rudersdorff, Mr. Montem Smith, and Herr Stepan. It was ably rendered, but subject to the usual disadvantage of 'stars' performing part music—each endeavouring to 'outshine' the other, to the inevitable destruction of the equilibrium and symmetry indispensable in this class of singing."

Of Mr. Avant's performance, the Southern Times says:—

"Mr. Avant's piano solo, fantasia on 'Robin Adair' and 'The Hundred Pipers,' added to his laurels both as performer and composer."

DORR.—A correspondent writes as below:—

"At the fourth of the 'Subscription Concerts,' Wellington Hall, Herr Wiener and Mr. Sheddick were again violinist and pianist." About the singers, the Dover Telegraph writes:—"Madame Emmeline Cole possesses a rich and mellow voice, perfectly under control, and her songs were charmingly given. Mr. Greenhill is a painstaking artist, with a pleasing tenor voice. His singing is all the better liked because of its light and shade."

YORK.—A correspondent has favoured us with the subjoined:—

"Mr. Tom Smith gave his second grand concert here on Thursday evening, the 11th inst. The artists were Mdlle. Tietjens, Mdlle. Vanzini, Mdlle. Scalchi, Herr Stockhausen, Signori Della Rocca, Tagliafico, Tito Mattei (pianoforte), and Bevignani (accompanist), all of whom used their best efforts, and gave great satisfaction to the numerous and fashionable audience. The York Choral Union, under the direction of Mr. R. S. Burton, of Leeds, sang most successfully two or three glees between the first and second parts; and no higher compliment can be paid them than to say they were worthy to perform on the same occasion with the artists above named."

BIRMINGHAM.—The following is from our own correspondent:—

"The weather, which for some considerable time past it would have been gross flattery to call genial, has by no means impeded the musical activity of this busy town (so-called), there having been three concerts within as many weeks. First: Mr. Flavitta, at the Exchange Rooms, with a chamber-concert programme as follows:—

"Trio, pianoforte and strings, E flat, Op. 93, Hummel. Solos, violin—Romance, H. Ries; Slumber song, Reber. Solos, piano—Schlummerlied, Schumann; Tarantelle, Thalberg. Quartet, strings, in D, No. 1, Op. 64, Haydn. Solos, violoncello—Adagio, Mozart; Musette (17th century). Trio, pianoforte and strings, Op. 52, Rubinstein.

"The executants in the quartet were Messrs. Flavell, Ries, Hayward, and Daubert, the first and third being local professors, the other two well known at St. James's Hall and the Crystal Palace. The pianist, Mr. Franklin Taylor, is (I understand) a native of Birmingham; his performances here have therefore an additional interest, and upon this occasion he showed himself in all respects worthy the high praise which has been generally bestowed upon him by the London press. Although the attendance was not so large as could have been wished, Mr. Flavell had no reason to be dissatisfied with the artistic result, which was a complete success, the artists one and all acquitting themselves in a manner which left little to desire.—Next in order came Mr. Anderton's orchestral concert at the Masonic Hall. The principal pieces for the band were Rossini's overture to Otello; Arthur Sullivan's Overture, In Memoriam; Mendelssohn's symphony in A major ('Italian'); and a selection from Donizetti's Favorita. This is the first time Mr. Sullivan's work has been heard in Birmingham, and it may be agreeable to that gentleman to know that the highly favourable impression he created at the Town Hall here in 1864, when his Kenilworth was produced, is now more than confirmed by the overture which was introduced to the public at the Norwich Festival. The advent of his Prodigal Son, to be given by the Birmingham Choral Society on March 3rd, with Mesdames Rudersdorff and Patey, Messrs. Vernon Rigby and Carl Stepan, in the principal parts, is anxiously looked forward to. But this by the way. The solo vocalist was Madame Patey-Whytock, who, being in beautiful voice, charmed her hearers pre-eminently. In Mendelssohn's Rondo Brillante, for pianoforte and orchestra, Mr. Anderton (the concert-giver), won deserved applause, but the orchestra lacked the refinement necessary to give full effect to this exquisite composition. Indeed it seems almost impossible to find an orchestra out of London (Manchester honorably excepted), efficient in the full sense of the term.—The great feature of Mr. Harrison's concert at the Town Hall on the 17th, was the appearance of Herr Joachim, who has not played in Birmingham for some three years past, and the reception given to the greatest of violinists was of the heartiest. His solos were a Prelude and Gavotte of Bach, and Spohr's Barcarolle and Scherzo, with pianoforte accompaniment. Beethoven's trio in G major was set down, but in consequence of Signor Piatti's absence, through indisposition, the sonata-duet of the same composer in C minor (Op. 30), was substituted. In this, Madame Schumann sustained the pianoforte part, Mozart's sonata in A major being also played by the same artists. For solos, Madame Schumann selected one of her Nachtstücke of her late husband, and a Scherzo by Mendelssohn, exhibiting in both all her wonted energy and familiarity with the key-board. To praise Herr Joachim is akin to gilding refined gold, or painting the lily, but as a faithful chronicler it is my duty to report the generally expressed opinion that he seemed to play even more finely than ever. The vocalists, Madame Lemmens-Sherrington and Mr. Vernon Rigby, both won encores, to which they in each case responded. The gentleman has however much to learn before he can sing Beethoven's 'Adelaide,' which we have had three times in the Town Hall in little more than a month, the previous singers having been Herr Stockhausen (baritone), and Mr. Sims Reeves. It is not well to make, still less to provoke comparisons, which Mrs. Malaprop says are 'odorous.'—BUTTON OF BIRMINGHAM."

CARMARTHEN.—In the Journal of Feb. 18th we read:—

"The first annual season of the Carmarthen Choral Class was wound up on Monday evening last, in a peculiarly gratifying and unexpected manner. Mr. Valentine Davis, one of the vice-presidents of the society, and a gentleman whose invariable motto is, 'Do unto others as you would wish to be done by,' issued invitations to the whole of the performing members of the class and the committee to a musical soirée at the Assembly Rooms, to which about sixty-five ladies and gentlemen responded. The room was most brilliantly lighted up with wax candles set in magnificent silver candelabras, and the tables generously supplied cut his idea of giving a drawing-room appearance to his entertainment. The programme was then performed. At intervals during the evening a posse of waiters handed round to the guests, cake, biscuits, and a profusion of choice wines, including port, sherry, and champagne of the rarest vintages. The Rev. Latimer M. Jones proposed a vote of thanks to Mr. Davis for his kind hospitality, which was carried with acclamation, and Mr. Davis responded, expressing the great pleasure he felt in entertaining his guests. The company broke up about eleven o'clock."

GLASGOW.—The following is condensed from the Glasgow Daily Herald of Feb. 19:—

"Last night the Beggars' Opera was produced at the Theatre Royal to a crowded house, of course with Mr. Sims Reeves as Captain Macheath, and however high the popular expectation, it was fully realized. We never hear Mr. Reeves sing without discovering some fresh point of interest. It is not only his voice, in proportion as all times irreproachable—there is something beyond each. Mr. Reeves possesses, in an eminent degree, the rare gift of imbuing music with refined poetic sentiment and feeling. It is this that makes him attractive alike to the masses and to educated musicians. When most singers appeal to the feelings the devices of the art are resorted to—hence we have, instead of pathos, vibrato and tremolo, which lead to mock expression. Mr. Reeves does not have recourse to such tricks, his naturally sympathetic voice, combined with his own fastidious taste, enabling him to dispense with them. Last night he both acted well and looked the part admirably, apparently entering with personal enjoyment into the delineation of the jovial Captain. His singing in the duets, 'Pretty Polly' and 'The Miser thus,' as well as in the solos, 'If the Heart' (encored), and 'How happy could I be with either,' was simply incomparable. The scene in the condemned cell, where the medley is introduced, served to show Mr. Reeves' great facility in giving expression to quick-changing shades of feeling. He was well supported by Miss Jane Vincent as Polly. Miss Vincent evoked the sympathies of the audience in her first air, 'Can Love be controlled?' and improved her advantage on till the close of the opera. We were sorry the orchestra did not give her better support. Mr. Duncan Smyth received an encore for 'Who deeply drinks'—the introduction of which, however, was an anachronism. Miss Anderson dressed and acted the part of Lucy well; and a word of commendation is due to Mr. Fitzroy as Mr. Appleby. The piece was well put on the stage. To-night, the last of Mr. Reeves' engagement, he will appear in The Beggars' Opera and The Waterman."

DUBLIN.—From the Evening Post we extract the following:—

"The proposal for a new theatre in Dublin is one likely to meet with popular support. Messrs. Gunn, of Grafton Street, are the promoters, and their name is a guarantee that, should a patent be granted, the establishment will be got up on a scale creditable to the city. It is not intended to be carried on counter to any existing establishment. It will be devoted principally to lighter performances, not cultivated to any extent in Dublin. Musical pieces will enter largely into the entertainments. The site for the building is at the Stephen's Green end of Grafton Street. One of the principal entrances will be formed in South King Street, close to Stephen's Green, which will necessitate the removal of old and unsightly lane premises at present in existence."

CORK.—Respecting the concert given here lately by Mr. Santley, the Cork Examiner says:—

"A treat of this kind so rarely occurs that it is always eagerly availed of, and on this occasion not even the unusually formidable prices of admission deterred the citizens from attending. This result we cannot but attribute in some degree to the fact that it was the occasion of the début in her native city of Miss Helene D'Alton Shea, a young and gifted vocalist, the daughter of an old and distinguished Cork gentleman. Certainly this feature in the performances lent a peculiar charm to the event, and the presentation to the young lady of an address and testimonial from the citizens of Cork, added more than ordinary public importance to it. The concert company embraced first-class talent. Mr. Santley is a host in himself; Madame Sinico properly commands high consideration; Miss Edmonds, too, is not slightly in value to a concert company; of Miss Dalton we have said enough to show why she should awaken great interest in Cork, and we know that her achievements even in the British metropolis have been highly spoken of; Herr Wilhelmj is a violinist one might be content to hear long evening without other entertainment; and the company also included Herr Pauer, the celebrated pianist. Not a little disappointment was felt at the absence of Madame Goddard, whose name appeared in the early announcements of the concert; but Herr Pauer took that celebrated pianist's place."

FLORENCE.—Herr von Bülow performed several pieces at the last concert, given by the Società Cherubini.

KÖNIGSBERG.—Herr Rubinstein's last work, a "one-act sacred opera," entitled Der Thurmbau von Babel, was performed a short time ago.

LEIGE.—The 129th anniversary of Grétry's birth was celebrated in this town, his birthplace, by the revival of his opera, Zémire et Azore. The Guide Musical observes:—"It is a strange thing that of all Grétry's scores, the one which, in our opinion, has preserved its colour, together with its freshness and novelty, is the very one in which, to use the expression of Grétry himself, he tried to do a bit of the old ——, we mean Richard Cœur de Lion, a work full of originality and chivalrous character. We do not hesitate preferring it greatly to Zémire et Azor, which, we all know, was the composer's favourite opera. We cannot conceal the fact, that Zémire et Azor has aged extremely, both as regards the music and the book." It might reasonably be supposed that, if the management thought it worth while to revive the opera, and on such an occasion, too, they would have done so in good style. Quite the contrary. The performance was unsatisfactory. On this head our contemporary remarks:—"The occasion was a solemn one; a great fuss had been previously made about it. The fact was notified to every person who passed by a few wretched flags, waving in the cold air, around Grétry's statue, and the public came in great numbers, believing in a programme of which only a portion of the promises was fulfilled." After Zémire et Azor, Mdlle. Juillet read the verses composed by M. Marcellis, senior, for the inauguration of Grétry's statue, in 1843; then various choruses, by the hero of the festival, were sung, and, lastly, his bust was duly crowned, on the stage, with laurels.—About the middle of March, Madame Adelina Patti will appear in Faust and Les Huguenots. In the latter opera she will sustain, for the first time in any theatre, the part of Valentine.

MR. WOOD'S OPERA TOUR.

The Drury Lane Company began work in Edinburgh on the 21st, with a performance of Lucia. Mdlle. Ilma di Murska made her first appearance in the Scottish capital on this occasion, and is thus spoken of in the Scotsman:—

"Mdlle. Ilma di Murska made her first appearance before an English audience in 1865, proving herself great in voice, and even greater in dramatic talent, and before the end of that season took the public of London by storm. She has since maintained her position among the foremost operatic artists of the day, and the character of Lucia is one of the parts in which she has attained her greatest triumphs. Graceful, blonde, and prepossessing in appearance, with a good deal of vivacity in her countenance, there is, nevertheless, the most perfect girlish gentleness and refinement in her aspect, corresponding with the ideal of the heroine; and she possesses, at the same time, a complete command of all the rapidly succeeding emotions involved in the second and third acts. Her voice has rare compass and power, and she sings with delightful ease and vehability—her highest notes are about her best, and next to them her lowest. Her fine ornate version of the cabaletta, 'Regnare nel silenzio,' was followed by a burst of applause. Her acting and singing were extremely touching in the duet in which her brother persuades her that her lover is false, in the scene (which was encored), and in the impassioned close of the second act, where she is cursed by Edgardo. Her greatest success, however, was in the mad scene, a performance in which we equally admired her intense dramatic power and her rare flexibility of voice. In the difficult peroration her command of every sort of embellishment made a great impression, and 'Sparge d'amaro pianto' was sung with a deep pathos and vocal execution that roused the enthusiasm of the audience."

The next evening, Il Barbiere was performed, and introduced Mdme. Monbelli, of whom the critic thus speaks:—

"Mdme. Monbelli, who last night made her début here in the part of Rosina has not yet been heard in opera in London, but won golden opinions from the public at a Philharmonic concert last May, and in opera as well as concert she was delighting the visitors of Aix-la-Chapelle and Wiesbaden last July and August. She has a bright clear voice of rich and mellow quality, uniting great flexibility with marvellous power of expression, rather a mezzo-soprano than a pure soprano, which is an advantage for this rôle. Departing a little from some of the established conventionalities of the part, she gave us a most delightful representation of the charming, teasing, and cunning ward of Don Bartolo. Her 'Una voce' was delivered in a style both original and beautiful, and with an execution as finest as her phrasing was natural and expressive. For the lesson scene and its encore she gave two Spanish songs—one of them, 'La Calesera'—and there was a something in her acting and aspect all through the opera that was suggestive of Spanish local colouring. Mdme. Monbelli's Rosina differs exceedingly from Mdlle. Patti's. It would be hard to say which is the more delightful; but we are inclined to think that the former must be nearer the part as Rossini imagined it."

The other members of Mr. Wood's company received more or less praise, and the performances generally appear to have given much satisfaction.

NEW MUSIC.

We are always glad to welcome the music of Mr. T. M. Mudie, because well assured that anything from his elegant and scholarly pen must have a more than common value. Songs, however, we can only consider in the light of an earnest of better to follow. Remembering a certain overture in the Italian style played at a New Philharmonic concert, about two years ago, from the known arguing the unknown, we await the production of symphonies too long withheld from public notice. There are three of Mr. Mudie's songs before us. "Happy dreams" (R. Mills & Sons), in the key of F flat, and with a compass of nine notes, is remarkable for the elegance of its expressive melody, and the simple though musicianly harmonies with which it is accompanied. The words, by C. H. Mudie, are much above the average of their class. "When my thirsty soul I steep" (Cramer & Co.), a setting in G minor of Moore's well-known translation from Anacreon, takes much higher ground. There is a Handelian vigour about the music very uncommon in these degenerate days; while the happy manner in which the force of the words is heightened, and the charming contrast presented in each verse by the passage marked a piacere, go to make up a work of genuine merit. We have seen few songs of late worthy to be compared with this. The Dying Gladiator (Cramer & Co.), words by Lord Byron, is a scena of considerable pretensions. Mr. Mudie has treated this fine subject with freedom and power, as well as with much dramatic effect. Among the striking points in his work are—first, the expressive chromatic passage on the words, "And his drooped head sinks gradually down;" next, the charming music accompanying the allusion to the gladiator's home; and last, the exciting episode which leads to the invocation "Arise, ye Goths, arise." But the entire scena is deserving of attention as the work of a man who knows well how to express his ideas.

WIESBADEN.—"Better late than never" thought, no doubt, the management of the Theatre here, and, consequently, prodnced, on the 24th inst., Meyerbeer's L'Africaine.

PAKINGTON VERSUS DUDLEY.

Sir J. Pakington has addressed the following very sensible letter to the Editor of the Worcestershire Chronicle :—

"SIR,—I trust you will allow me to avail myself of your next publication to draw the attention of my neighbours to the critical position in which the ancient Musical Festivals of the three dioceses of Worcester, Gloucester, and Hereford in aid of an excellent charity, are now placed.

"The restoration of our beautiful Cathedral has been in progress for some years, but is still incomplete, and the funds raised, firstly, by the Dean and Chapter, and, secondly, by two public appeals to the liberality of the diocese, are exhausted. It was under these circumstances that, at a recent meeting of the Restoration Committee, which consists of the Bishop and the Dean and Chapter, together with certain noblemen and gentlemen connected with the diocese, the Earl of Dudley offered to give 10,000*l.* towards completing the Cathedral, on condition that the Musical Festivals should be discontinued. This is, of course, a question to be decided by the Dean and Chapter—not by the committee; and it is arranged that the committee shall meet again in Easter week to receive their answer. The temptation held out to the Dean and Chapter by such an offer is great, but the answer will probably be much influenced by any expression of the wishes of the public which they may, in the interval, receive. I was present, as a member of the committee, when the offer was made, and I met it at once by an earnest protest, and a declaration that I should do everything in my power to prevent such an arrangement. But, as an individual, I am powerless, unless I am supported in the opinions I entertain. I can only appeal to public feeling, and express my hope that it will not sanction the sudden and unnecessary destruction of an institution by which, for no less than 146 years, many a widow and orphan has been rescued from sorrow and distress, and the public have annually heard in one or other of the three cathedrals, the most sublime compositions by which the genius of man has enabled us to sing the praise of God. And where can the words of the Holy Scriptures, combined with and illustrated by those glorious compositions, be so fitly heard? Where can they excite so much devotional feeling as within the sacred walls of our finest churches? But I must not enlarge upon this part of the subject, or I shall exceed the space which I can fairly expect you to grant me. I will only say further upon this point, that, while I respect scruples which I am sure are conscientious, but which I am unable to share, I am confident that all whose sympathy and co-operation I hope to receive will join me in a feeling of extreme regret that, after the truly generous and munificent aid which our work of restoration has received from the Earl of Dudley, his lordship should have taken any course of which we cannot approve. I must not, however, close this letter without giving some information to the public as to the real financial position of the Cathedral question. I believe I am fully justified in stating, that, whether Lord Dudley's condition is objectionable or not, his offer is larger than the completion of the Cathedral requires. The estimates in the hands of the committee for finishing all parts of the restoration fall short by several hundreds of 10,000*l.* To this it may perhaps be answered that estimates are often exceeded. This is true. But it is my belief, and not without some reason, that these estimates may, with due regard to the beauty of the work, be reduced. Be this as it may, the committee have received an intimation from the Chapter that they will be able to contribute from time to time from the fund at their disposal for the maintenance of the Cathedral, &c., towards the remaining work. I am not in a position to state what may be the exact amount of this contribution, I have reason to believe that it would effect a material reduction in the sum to be obtained from other sources, and I am sanguine that whenever an appeal may be made to the diocese, to subscribe the remainder, it will meet with a response so general and so generous, as to put an end to any excuse for discontinuing our ancient Festivals, for the sake of the price that can be obtained for their abandonment. I trust this question will be decided by public opinion, on principle alone. If these sacred performances in sacred buildings are wrong—if we have all been in error for a century and a half; let them, on that ground, be stopped. If they are not wrong—if it is, as I believe, in our great churches that we can most appropriately join in 'Hallelujahs,' and declare in choral song that the 'Heavens are telling the glory of God,' let them be continued. These are my views on this interesting question, and I think it right to submit them to the consideration of the public. It will now be for those in authority in the city and county to consider what steps, if any, they may deem it to be their duty to take. For myself I will only add that I will join cordially in any movement that may be commenced, with the view of appealing to the Dean and Chapter to persevere in the course which they and their predecessors have so long adopted, and to resist every inducement to put an end to our Musical Festivals at Worcester.—I remain, Sir, yours faithfully,

"Westwood Park, Feb. 14, 1870. JOHN S. PAKINGTON."

HISTORICAL MUSIC.

The production of Spohr's so called "Historical" Symphony at the Crystal Palace, and its very decided failure as a specimen of historical music, gives an opportunity for comment upon the form of art to which it belongs. Let us begin by saying that this is neither useful nor dignified. It is not useful, because we are not dependent upon modern composers for a knowledge of their predecessors. If, in politics, religion, and social life, we had full and accurate records of the past generally accessible, there would be no demand for the modern recorder of facts. This is actually the case in music. We know, or may know with very little trouble, what was the condition of music at any given epoch since it developed into a science; and may have such knowledge at first hand, because the actual compositions of the period have come down to us. Hence there is no need for the musicians of our own day to bring forward imitations. We can do without such things, and, even if they were better than they usually are, their authority compared with that of the originals lying close at hand, would amount to nothing.

But neither is the writing of so-called "historical" music dignified. Setting aside that it is not wanted, it can never have a value at what it pretends to be, those who compose the thing are little better than artistic masqueraders, dressing themselves up in the fashion of a past age to divert idle people. Of course there are occasions when, for the sake of local colour, or of "outline" hardly less important in music than in the drama, a composer has to go out of himself, and become indentified with the men of the past so far as to think their thoughts and to speak their language. An example of this was supplied at the Exeter Hall concert of Saturday week by Mr. G. A. Macfarren's Hey-day. In that case, the subject and all its surroundings illustrating old English life, the composer formed his music upon the old English pattern. Against a course so legitimate in its purpose and so artistic in its conception nothing can be said. But when imitation exists purely for its own sake it is an idle thing, and needs discouragement. This is the main reason why we cannot except the "Historical" Symphony of Spohr, a work ostensibly written in four different styles for no other apparent object, than to show off the fancied versatility of its composer.

But, granting that imitative music has a raison d'être, its existence should be held subject to certain conditions. For example, a composer may issue a series of historical sketches in chronological or any other order. Doing this he may be wasting his time, and making himself ridiculous, but nothing more. On the other hand, it cannot be permitted him to obtrude his whims on a recognized musical form to its impairment or destruction. If he chooses to make dolls for himself and dress them up in fancy costumes, nobody will trouble to say, "Don't;" but the case is different when he puts motley garments upon some classic figure. Of this latter Spohr has been guilty in his "Historical" Symphony. Such a work, as we think, is only permissible when one style is chosen—when there are four it becomes a forgfold absurdity. The unity of the symphonic form, to mention only the chief sin involved, is outraged. In Spohr's work we see that form treated as though made up of distinct parts, having no connection beyond that of accidental juxtaposition. Hence the "Historical" Symphony, so called, is, in strictness, not one work, but four, placed in the order, and, as regards mere outline, accommodated to the shape of a symphony proper. Beyond these points the difference is fundamental and essential. A symphony proper is not four works, but one; all its parts conducing to the same end, regulated by the same spirit, and indispensable to the same design. Examine any of the symphonies of Mozart or Beethoven, and this unity stands out plainly enough. The ear is led on from movement to movement as by a natural process; and at the close is satisfied with the satisfaction which a complete work of art can give. Contrast this with Spohr's production and the result is startling. In the latter we are shown a succession of phantasmagoria distorted by the medium through which they are apparent, and as distinct one from the other as the shadowy kings in Macbeth. Now Handel and Bach, now Haydn and Mozart, now Beethoven, and now Auber (or what is meant to be these illustrious men), pass before us till the mind is confused and definite ideas made impossible.

But there are special circumstances in the case of Spohr which make his failure more complete. We can only guess how Mozart or Mendelssohn would have succeeded with a "Historical" Symphony; and, guessing, we say they would have made the thing as interesting as complete imitation allows. Spohr has done nothing of the kind. His music is neither one thing nor the other. In outline it resembles the composer's model; in detail it is the pure and unadulterated composer himself. Hence the idea conveyed is, that Spohr could only catch the more obvious features of the men he copied, having no power to grasp their expression or reflect their thoughts. By this Spohr is not wronged. His was not a plastic genius, but one cast in iron. Whatever he did showed unvarying characteristics, and bore the same unmistakable stamp. The least acute judge of style can never mistake his music; for as soon as his florid harmonies, incessant modulation, and sentimental phrases appear, they are recognized with no shadow of reserve. Hence Spohr, of all eminent musicians, was least fitted for the work he undertook. Such a man contemplating dramatical music, is as though Mr. J. L. Toole appeared in the character of the lord Hamlet.

The upshot of the whole matter is not encouraging to the business of a musical masquerade. In composition, as in most other work, naturalness is best; and he most commits his own interest who, having first studied his own genius, implicitly obeys its indications, and employs the gifts of nature as nature intended. Conveying this lesson, the "Historical" Symphony is not without the use which attached to the bones of Bunyan's wandering pilgrims.

THADDEUS EGG.

MEDIÆVAL MUMMERY AT SALISBURY CATHEDRAL.

(From the "Choir.")

The ceremony of installing three clergymen as prebendaries of Salisbury Cathedral, on the 12th ult., was interrupted by a protest from the Rev. H. W. Pullen, one of the minor canons, and as the canon-in-residence ruled that it could not be received, the document has since been published, thus enabling us to set some extracts from it before our readers. Mr. Pullen commences with a description of the ceremony of installation:—

"At the commencement of morning service, while three minor canons, the choristers, and the lay clerks are taking their accustomed places in the choir, the dean, canons, and prebendaries, together with those about to be installed, repair to the chapter house, where a service is performed, comprising detached portions of mediæval Latin, relieved by intervals of agreeable conversation in the mother tongue. As soon as the chanting of the psalms has begun, two minor canons leave the choir for the chapter house, where they are instructed by the dean, or 'president of the chapter,' to instal the newly-appointed prebendaries into their respective seats in due form. This they proceed to do, conducting each prebendary into the choir, standing over him as he takes possession of his stall, and pronouncing some mystical words in a language understanded of nobody at all, inasmuch as the psalms are being sung, and the organ is playing its full accompaniment throughout the ceremony. And thus the attention of the people is distracted, in the midst of a most solemn act of praise, for the mere purpose of keeping up a silly custom, derived from ancient times; only for the sake of making as much parade as possible about the conferring of a dignity which is worth absolutely nothing whatever—which is the very emptiest of all the empty honours which the Church of England has to bestow. Further, on the return of the minor canons and prebendaries to the chapter house after the installation, some more mediæval Latin, and some more scraps of agreeable conversation ensue, while the minor canon on duty reads the first lesson in the choir; after which the service is deliberately suspended until the dean and prebendaries are ready to assume their accustomed seats—or, in other words, the worship of God is made to wait, till it is convenient to the dignitaries to join in its celebration."

This proceeding Mr. Pullen proceeds to stigmatize as idle and mischievous. It is idle, he considers, because the gentlemen installed will have no real connection with or interest in the Cathedral, and he gives the following reasons in support of his second charge:—

"It is the custom, at least in this Cathedral, to draw the strongest possible line of demarcation between the prebendaries and the minor canons; a line so strong, that the latter are not only passed over perpetually, no matter how long they may have served their office, and made to yield precedence to each newly appointed prebendary; but are judged unworthy even of sitting on the same level with their brother-clergy during the performance of Divine service. The origin of these somewhat peculiar relations between them is not, perhaps, sufficiently well known. According to the primary constitution of our Cathedral, all the clergy enjoyed the rank of prebendary at least, and were all required to take an efficient part in the choral services of their Church. But as in ancient days no less than in modern, music was judged far too contemptible an accomplishment to be worth considering as a qualification for office in a musical society, each prebendary was permitted to appoint a vicar to perform his duties in the choir, while he himself resided upon some other benefice elsewhere. This vicar, as our records plainly demonstrate, was for the most part a man of vastly inferior grade; frequently not even in full orders; less frequently still, a graduate; and least frequently of all, if ever a gentleman. So convenient a custom as this, by which a prebendary could secure the enjoyment of a rich estate at the cost of some trifling annual payment to his deputy, was not likely to fall into disuse; and we, therefore, find that the office of vicar became so regularly established as to be endowed with lands and tithes through the charity of bishops or others, and even protected by Royal Charter through the favour and clemency of kings. This is the origin of all corporations of priest vicars, or vicars choral, whether they have retained their strict designation, or have adopted from cathedrals of the new foundation the more modern title of minor canon.

"Now it is possible that to such men as these it may have been no personal degradation to occupy an inferior row of seats, and to be shut out from all visible association with the higher orders of clergy. Nevertheless, such a state of things was a degradation, a most fatal degradation, to the offices which they held, and the services which they performed. It brought the music into contempt, as an exercise too mean for a prebendary, and only fit for his vicar. It generated, throughout all cathedral work, a system of deputising, whereby everybody evaded as much as he could, and transferred his duties to another. It begat a spirit of indifference among the authorities; a slovenly performance on the part of the choir; a hurried slipshod service, an irreverent demeanour, and a coldness of devotion, which is a constant reproach to us up to this very time. And because the ceremony now under discussion tends to perpetuate these abuses, by asserting that principle which I believe to be the sole origin of them all—the principle of a distinction of caste between one Cathedral clergyman and another, I call it a mischievous ceremony. It seems to me that prebendaries ought either to be done away with altogether, or required to do something more for their Cathedral than to preach one sermon a year; or, at the very least, if they be retained, it would appear only reasonable that the minor canons, being now just as much the recognized clergy of their Establishment as prebendaries were in days of old, should be raised to an equal level with their brethren, by having prebendal stalls conferred upon them. For indeed, since the relations between these two bodies are entirely changed, and the duties of the one have been permanently assigned to the other, there can be no meaning in their being both retained together; unless it be expressly intended to regard the prebendaries as an aristocracy, receiving dignity by contrast with the clergy below them. And, as the only clergy below them are the four minor canons, on whom the whole burden of the choral service falls, it follows that the maintenance of any such aristocracy is a direct insult to that service, and tends to bring sacred offices into contempt before the world. The men who are judged worthy, by the cultivation of certain natural gifts, in addition to the ordinary requirements of a clergyman, to lead the daily choral worship of a Cathedral, ought to be esteemed the highest, and not the lowest, among the ministers of their Church. It is simply ridiculous. If not something far worse, that in a Church whose distinctive feature is the celebration of a musical service, the only men on whom that Church confers any honour are those who are no musicians. It is mere empty talk to preach to crowded congregations of the reverence due to sacred offices and sacred things, when they see that the only priests on the Cathedral staff to whom no reverence is paid are those to whom these sacred offices are specially committed. It is most unreasonable that we four minor canons, who have been chanting the prayers in this Church for seven, fourteen, or five and thirty years, should have to give way again and again to each newly-appointed dignitary, in no essential respect superior to ourselves, whose place any one of us could fill with more or less efficiency, but who, on the other hand, could not sing our services to save his life."

Mr. Pullen concludes his protest by stating that he regards each successive conferring of a dignity in the Cathedral as a fresh insult to the minor canons, and expresses his belief that this insult will suffer aggravation every day until they are placed on an equality with the rest of the Cathedral clergy. The only principle of precedence which he would admit is that of seniority in years or length of service, and he would also give the minor canons, as musicians, a voice in the regulation of those musical services which are now, he is bound in conscience to declare, for the simple reason that they are in the hands of unmusical men, nothing short of a dishonour to Almighty God and a disgrace to this Church and country. Until such a reform takes place he considers that there is good reason why the public should withhold their support from the fund for restoring the Cathedral, which had better be allowed to fall into ruin than continue to foster such abuses.

A MUSICAL WEDDING.

Mr. J. Lamborn Cock, the well-known music publisher, was married on Thursday, to Miss Emma (Ellice) Jewell, the accomplished pianist. Amongst the numerous friends present on the occasion was Professor Sterndale Bennett, who composed the following "Introit," which was sung by the choir of St. Gabriel's Church:—

Numbers vi. 24—26:—"The Lord bless thee and keep thee. The Lord make His face shine upon thee and be gracious unto thee. The Lord lift up His countenance upon thee and give thee peace."—J. L. C. and E. L. C.

The employés in Mr. Lamborn Cock's establishment (63, New Bond Street) have presented him, as a testimonial of their good wishes, with a handsome silver inkstand, inscribed with an appropriate address.

The appointment of organist to the Parish Church of St. Marylebone is vacant. The salary is £60 per annum.

"Mother," said a little poet of four summers, "just hear the trees makin' music for the leaves to dance by."

Mr. Alfred Holmes's Jeanne d'Arc will be played early in March at the Italiens, Mdlle. Krauss taking the chief part.

A grand concert in honour of Berlioz will shortly be given in Paris. Its projectors hope to give the solemnity a national character.

Mr. Benedict is credited by La France Musicale with writing an oratorio entitled Petrick.

M. Aubéry du Boulloy, a distinguished French amateur of music, died recently at Verneuil.

The French Government have made M. Paul de Saint-Victor an Inspector of Fine Arts.

Covent Garden Theatre closed its doors on Saturday, to re-open on the 29th of March, for the season of Italian Opera, under Messrs. Gye and Mapleson.

Herr Stockhausen, the great German baritone, is not engaged for the Royal Italian Opera. He will, however, pass some weeks in London during the concert season.

Mr. G. F. Anderson has retired from the post of Conductor of Her Majesty's Band, on a full pension. Mr. W. G. Cusins is appointed his successor.

M. Gueymard, the tenor, has asked permission to establish a popular opera on the Boulevard du Temple, with prices as low as 75 centimes.

In the Crystal Palace, London, an orchestra of four thousand performers can be got together in front of an audience thirty thousand strong.

Miss Vinnie Ream is said to be a singer as well as a sculptor. If the old rule holds good, one singing Ream ought to be equal to twenty tuneful quires.

A westward-bound passenger was lately surprised by the following announcement of the conductor:—"Chicago—fifteen minutes for divorces."

In our obituary is recorded the death, in Paris, of Madame Goldberg, wife of the composer and professor of that name. Madame Goldberg was well known and esteemed in London.

An Irishman, leaning against a lamp-post as a funeral procession was passing by, was asked who was dead. "I can't exactly say, sir," said he, "but I presume it's the jintleman in the coffin."

Two more decorations for artists. M. Auber is enrolled in the Order of the Osmanli, by unsolicited nomination of the Sultan; and Mdlle. Lucca has just received a Medal from the Grand-Duke of Saxe-Weimar.

Mr. and Mrs. Rosenthal, the vocalists (Mr. and Mrs. Maitland), have recovered damages, to the amount of £850, against the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, for injuries received while travelling on a professional tour.

Party (who has brought back the music-stool in disgust):—"Look'e 'ere, Mister Auctioneer, this plaguy thing ain't no manner of use at all; I've twisted un round, and ol' woman 'ave twisted un around, but sorra a bit of toon we can get out of un."

A Boston paper states that Mendelssohn's copy of Mozart's Nozze di Figaro now belongs to a gentleman in that city. The book is said to be "made of extraordinary value by liberal memoranda and notes in Mendelssohn's own writing."

A New York paper, referring to a contemporary, says:—"As for Gressy Watson's Art Journal, it fairly reeks with the sickening slime of its abject sycophancy." Who, after this, will Americanize all our Institutions?

At the Alexandra Theatre, Liverpool, the novelties after the pantomime will be Mr. Gilbert's Princess, and a new play by a local journalist (Duckworth), whose wife (Miss Phillie Hall) is to sustain the part of the heroine, an actress struggling against social prejudices—hence the title of Under the Ban.

The chime, manufactured in France for St. Joseph's Cathedral, in New York, consists of 43 bells. They are worked by a key-board. Attached to the chime, and independent of the key-board is a clock, which is made to play any required tune on the bells, by means of 123 hammers, arranged on the outside.

The organ belonging to the new hall of the Young Men's Christian Association of New York cost 10,000 dollars. It was fully paid for, with enough left to buy a Chickering Grand, by the proceeds of a single concert, given Dec. 1st. The price of admission to this concert was four dollars.

It is doubtful whether human eccentricity ever went further than in the case of Lord Holland, contemporaneous with William III. It was his custom to regale his horses with a weekly concert. He had a gallery erected for the purpose, and maintained that the music cheered their hearts and improved their tempers.

A young and pretty lady in New Orleans has undertaken a novel missionary work, which is likely to expose her to criticism, though she is evidently in earnest. She is visiting the concert saloons in that city for the purpose of reforming the habitués of those establishments. Her method is to sing a few hymns at each place, accompanying herself on the piano.

Mr. Brinley Richards' "Cambrian Pinme" has lately been sung at the concert in aid of St. John's Church Fund, at Bedford, the solo being given by Mr. Clough, who was compelled to sing it twice. It has also been played at a banquet in Marlborough House, by the band of the Grenadier Guards, arranged as a quick step, by Mr. D. Godfrey, bandmaster.

There will be two Italian opera companies in the provinces this spring and ensuing autumn. The Gye-Maplesonians go to the Alexandra Theatre, Liverpool, while, for the first time the Royal Amphitheatre will be transformed into an Italian operahouse for the Woodites. The Schneider opera troop also visit Liverpool during the year, but we believe it is not definitely settled at which theatre they will appear.

The music in the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher's church costs 7,000 dollars a year. The organist gets 1,200 dollars, the conductor 2,000 dollars, the tenor 1,000, the soprano 900 dollars, the contralto 800 dollars, and the basso 800 dollars, leaving 900 dollars for incidentals. The paid singers sing the solos as concerted pieces, but the hymns are sung by the whole congregation, led by a volunteer choir of about seventy performers.

A contretemps occurred the other day in connection with the playbills of two of the Liverpool theatres. The "house bills" of two rival establishments are printed in the same office, and by some accident, the name of the lessees of C theatre appeared on the bills of A theatre as the "sole responsible managers and directors." As the managers of A and C are on the best of terms, nothing serious resulted—except to the printer, who got a "wigging."

The Prince of Wales' Theatre, Liverpool, under the directorship of Mr. Joseph Eldred, late of the Gaiety, one of the lessees, is recovering its old prestige. The new lessees have re-decorated the theatre, collected a first-rate "troop," and produced pieces new to the town, the Christmas burlesque being written expressly for the Prince of Wales by Mr. Brough. The company are rehearsing a fresh version of Mr. Reece's Lady of the Lake, which will be followed by the first production in Liverpool of Mr. Halliday's Love's Doctor. So far the management has given satisfaction to Liverpool playgoers, and the Prince of Wales' theatre seems recall the palmy days of Mr. Alex. Henderson.

Here is some more American "sensation" anent the late Herr Gottschalk:—

"Gottschalk was one of the few original and remarkable artists of this century. As a composer, he was himself, and not some other diluted, while as a performer, he seemed almost divine. His trill was the most rapid and equal ever heard in New York; his staccatello points invariably accurate. His tours de force, octave thunders, and bravoures crescendos (!) were done in so entirely exceptional a manner, that they used to send 'a cool shiver of delight' through the very marrow of his listeners. If that orator is the soubrinquet of the orator par excellence among pianists. In losing Gottschalk, the sweet singer as well as the thunderer of the piano, we, as a nation, have sustained a heavy, perhaps an irreparable loss. Alas! poor Gottschalk! we hoped soon to see and hear him again, but instead thereof we are converted into one of the thousands of mourners, who shudder to realise how sudden is the change from the intoxicating triumphs of crowded concert-rooms to the dark dank tomb, from the near presence of smiling and warm-hearted friends, to the still closer companionship of the cold clay-worm!"

An American paper tells the following story, to which "Se non è vero," &c., applies:—

"A certain stock-up lady in London, of the shoddy order, once gave a fashionable soirée, and to make the affair go off more brilliantly, she entered into an arrangement with Mr. and Mrs. Reward Paul to be present in the evening, and give a quotation from their entertainment. The price fixed was two guineas. 'You will dine with us,' added the lady, with a gracious smile; 'but as the dinner I offer you is worth at least a guinea—that is, two guineas for the two—I shall hand you the difference.' Pythagoras himself could not have calculated more shrewdly. Mr. and Mrs. Paul, who dearly love a joke, accepted the invitation and went next day at the hour appointed. They seated themselves gravely at the table, and enjoyed the dinner right merrily. After dessert, bold rose simultaneously, each deposited a guinea on the plate, and bowing respectfully, they ordered their carriage and disappeared, to the great astonishment of every one present. Of course the mistress of the mansion was furious—but that didn't bring back the singers."

The following is a specimen of Western American criticism:—

"Miss Jenny Busk astonished the audience by her high soprano voice. Her notes, like the 1000 dollars U. S. greenbacks, are of too high a denomination for common country currency; and suggested the probability that her music teacher occupied the summit of Mont Blanc during her rehearsals, and was 'hard o' hearing.' She beats cats on high notes. There was no music or chest tone in her voice; but it was about six octaves above the screech of a last Indian. We lost a part of Miss Busk's extraordinary performance when we noticed several opera-glasses levelled at her very 'open countenance' as she was gushing out notes at a terrific altitude, from a mouth that was a caution to sugar-plums and shad-flies."

A musical paper called the Orpheonist, has been started in New York. Here is a specimen of its quality:—

"In that poor, shrunken, miserable, little, ditty hebdominal, called Watson's Weekly Art Journal (heaven save the mark!) for December 25th, we are informed that we are a 'fishwoman,' and a 'poke-nose,' and that every one of our concerts have been failures, all of which is very great news to us. If nine years of failure have been ours, we wonder who has paid all the bills. Certainly not Henry C. Watson. We can forgive our high-minded contemporaries, for between them all we get a good laugh about once a week. When it isn't Watson, it is the Weekly Review; and when neither of these, then Dwight condescends to play the dancing elephant for our entertainment. When all three are sleeping, the Season supplies the fun—by all of which papers we here return our most grateful acknowledgments. Poor Mr. J. K. Paine comes in for a little mud, too, and the N. Y. Tribune gets h—l from Watson's. Taken altogether, since we are in such excellent company, we rather think we can stand it. So much for the joke of the thing. Perhaps a little earnest may come next month.

"Postscript.—We were lately invited to subscribe 25 dollars to a benefit fund to this same Watson, but didn't feel as we could afford it, on account of our 'failure.' So we got the backgammoning, and he didn't get the 25 dollars."

The price of the Orpheonist, outside New York, is one cent. Inside, it is given away, for the reason which may be imagined.

True genius always reaps its reward. Some very eminent musicians and composers have been known to die poor. But we may be sure they deserved no better fate. Look at Mr. Gilmore, the gentleman who "arranged" that jubilee at Boston, and first found out that a salvo of artillery was the highest form of melody. What is the lesson of his life? He has received altogether 39,628 dollars 4 cents. for teaching brawny men to hammer on anvils in unison. Recently an opera was performed in this city, written by a gentleman, who received scarcely enough for the work to enable him to live in comfort for a month. He composed a good deal of music, which is always popular wherever it is played. Moreover, he conducted orchestras, just as Mr. Gilmore did. His name was Wallace, and if he was not a man with niggard hands during his life, how could he leave money at his death? We doubt whether he received so much as 40,000 dollars all his days. But then he lived in England—perhaps that makes the difference. Mr. Gilmore may thank his lucky stars that his lot was cast elsewhere, and that he was permitted to let off his big guns and beat his anvils, not on a rugged island, but in the very centre of the universe. He may not be a greater musician than Wallace, but he made more noise in the world, and was better paid to do it.—N. Y. Times.

The splendid diamonds in Ole Bull's bow, which have attracted so much attention, were not the gift of a single individual, as is supposed by many. The bow is about three times the ordinary weight, and two inches longer than usual. The diamonds are the gifts of friends at various times. The large one in the end was the gift of the Duke of Devonshire, and was presented to Ole Bull under the following circumstances:—The Duke's sister, Lady Granville, then residing in Paris, was paying him a visit at his château, nine miles from London. Ole Bull, and Rubini, the famous tenor, were invited to be present at the grand reception, when each contributed his skill to enliven the occasion. The Duke being, however, unfortunately, quite deaf, could not hear many fine points of Ole Bull's violin playing, and privately told him so, at the same time desiring him to remain after the company had dispersed, and take dinner with him alone. After dinner he requested the artist to extemporize some fantasias on familiar opera airs; and in order to hear and enjoy the performance, he tied a cord to the head of the violin, and taking the other end in his mouth, seated himself opposite the musician. After playing for his gratification some considerable time, the Duke arose, and, expressing his thanks for the great happiness that had thus been afforded him, the tears streaming down his cheeks, presented a magnificent diamond ring to the violinist, at the same time remarking that it was a family relic, and begging him to keep it as a souvenir.—New York Paper.—[Humbug.—A. S. S.]

A rich eccentric business man of Columbus, Ohio, has recently made a will which disinherits all the natural heirs of the maker of it, and devises the entire property in trust for the establishment of an infirmary for cats. It provides areas for that sweet amatory converse so dear to the feline heart, and rat-holes of the most ravishing nature, to be kept well stocked. The most ingenious contrivances are provided for securing to the rat a chance for escape, so that the cats may not lose the pleasures of the chase by finding their prey come too easily. High walls are to be built, with gently sloping roofs, for the moonlight promenades and other nocturnal amusements of the cats. The trustees are directed to select the grounds for this novel infirmary in the most populous part of some great American city, and the devisees are to be protected, by a competent force of nurses, from the ravages of men and dogs. No person of the male sex is ever to be admitted within the walls, and no female who has children or is under thirty years of age. This last provision of the will is more ridiculous than the previous ones. Says the devisor: "I have all my life been taught to believe that every thing in and about man was intended to be useful, and that if it was man's duty, as lord of animals, to protect all the lesser species, even as God protects and watches over him. For these two combined reasons —first, that my body, even after death, may continue to be made useful; and secondly, that it may be made instrumental, as far as possible, in furnishing a substitute for the protection of the bodies of my dear friends, the cats—I do hereby devise and bequeath the intestines of my body to be made up into fiddle-strings, the proceeds to be devoted to the purchase of an accordion, which shall be played in the auditorium of the Cat Infirmary by one of the regular nurses, to be selected for that purpose exclusively—the playing to be kept up for ever and ever, without cessation day or night, in order that the cats may have the privilege of always hearing and enjoying that instrument which is the nearest approach to their natural voice."

We cannot choose between them; one is as good as another—another as good as one."—The Queen.

OFFENBACH'S SIX NEW SONGS, published this day with English words, price 3s. each. Extract from review in The Queen, October 23rd:—

"Mr. Kenney has skilfully and tastefully adapted original words to these truly characteristic songs, so that the lovers of Offenbach may easy say one of them in the first drawing-room in the land, without fear of offence to the most fastidious. We have said the music is characteristic, and that it is without doubt; but it is something more—it is both fresh and genial, and for light, unpretending music, we know of nothing prettier.

"No. 1. LOVE AND POETRY, is a graceful song for a mezzo-soprano in E flat, in a sentimental style.

"No. 2. SOME OTHER DAY, is a gay and sparkling bolero in A flat for soprano, F the highest note.

"No. 3. OUTWARD BOUND, is simple to a degree, but withal charming; melody and accompaniment alike being in good taste.

"No. 4. SEE YONDER BLOOMING ROSE, another song of the sentimental order, is for soprano; highest note G, and very elegant.

"No. 5. GENTLY GLIDES OUR SKIFF, a barcarole in F, the gem of the series, and as original a barcarole as we can call to mind. The song is perhaps best suited for a tenor; it is excellently vocal, and abounds in novel and piquant effects. If M. Offenbach had written nothing but this barcarole, we should still say that he is a very clever and original musician.

"No. 6. CUPID AND HYMEN, though less attractive than the other numbers, is not without merit, and will possibly please many, more than would better music."

For his concert, Weber had his Jubilee Cantata studied in its entirety, in addition to the other pieces. Seated in a large arm-chair; wrapped up in furs; and apparently dosing, he listened to what was being done, restricting himself to merely giving a few hints in an under-tone; once only, he seemed to recollect the happy days when he commanded his musicians of Prague and Dresden. "Gentlemen!" he exclaimed, "pray stop! would you hollow like that in Heaven?" Moscheles, Hawes, Smart, and Fürstenau, assumed the whole task of organizing the concert. Weber was unable to undertake it. He was, also, compelled to renounce the idea of conducting; Cramer and Mori considered it an honour to replace him; with regard to the performance, all the great artists in England were proud to take part in it. Yet, despite all these manifestations, so soothing to his heart, the concert did not allow him a minute's repose. "It is to take place in a fortnight," he wrote to his wife. "Would you believe it? My heart beats like a child's. It is the last time that I shall ever give a concert."

The hour fixed for the concert arrived at last.—What a disappointment.—In the first place, it was the day of Epsom Races; then, Beyrer, the singer, had given, in the afternoon, a grand Musical Réunion at the Duke of St. Albans', when all the aristocracy had been present; then, it began raining in torrents; and, lastly, the Lady Patronesses of the Philharmonic Society, not having received a visit from Weber, had not troubled themselves at all about his concert. The consequence was that the Argyll Rooms were almost empty, so that his friends were absolutely ashamed, and dreaded the moment of his entering the orchestra. And, in truth, when he appeared, leaning upon the arm of his friend Smart, his lips were for a moment contracted by a bitter smile.

The Jubilee Cantata, which the translator entitled the Festival of Peace, was something marvellous. Each artist surpassed himself; then came the turn of the matchless Rieveaux, whose fine talents was justly applauded; the overture to Oberon was next dashed off with great spirit, Mori being the conductor; and the song of Lalla Rookh, followed by the overture to Euryanthe, completed the programme. It was the last time Weber's fingers touched the keys of the instrument to which he owed his first triumphs.

The success was great, but the receipts were nothing. What a dispositment for the dying master, deeply wounded in his amour-propre, his glory, and his matchless Réseuse, to leave the concert-room, he fell upon a sofa in the green-room. He said to the friends who came up and grasped his hand, "What do you say now, eh?—Weber in London!" He was attacked by a vomiting of blood, succeeded by a fainting fit of several minutes. His friends sent off immediately for Dr. Kind, his medical man, who, by a singular coincidence, was a nephew of his old companion, Franz Kind, the faithful colleague of his happy days. Blisters were applied, and Weber passed a quiet night.

The very next day, he began thinking about his benefit which was fixed for the 5th June. He was to conduct Der Freischütz, given in its integrity. But he soon abandoned the idea, on account of the great fatigue he had experienced after Miss Paton's benefit. In consequence of some conversations he had with Dr. Kind on the subject, Fürstenau proposed to Weber that he should return direct to Dresden, by the way of Brussels and Cologne, instead of going to Paris and stopping there a few days, as it had been settled he should do. The reader may imagine that Weber joyfully consented; as Fürstenau, too, influenced by a spirit of the profoundest devotion, renounced his own concert, and as the earlier they set out the better, the 6th of June was fixed for the day of their departure.

With what impatience the composer looked forward to that day so ardently desired! But he could scarcely stand, and he experienced such difficulty in breathing that a very movement caused him acute, excisting pain. Kind sent for the patient's intimate friends, and proved to them that the final catastrophe could not possibly be far distant. Fürstenau proposed sleeping in Weber's room, but Weber would not allow him to do so. "My dear fellows," he said, "you make me out worse than I am." He would not consent either to one of Sir George Smart's servants remaining near at hand in the next room, in case he should require anything; they could not even prevail on him to leave off boiling his door inside, as he was accustomed to do.—In consequence of more bad symptoms, Kind applied a blister to the sufferer's chest. This, as he himself writes in his note-book, procured him "a delicious night." The improvement in his condition enabled him to settle his accounts, a task in which he was assisted by Goetschen, a son of one of the musicians in the band at Dresden. He likewise begged the young man to make some purchases for his (Weber's) family.

On the evening of the 4th June, the day before that fixed for his departure, he chatted gaily with Smart, Goetschen, Fürstenau, and Moscheles, about his journey and his plans of repose at his beloved Hosterwitz. His companions listened to him, and were delighted at seeing him in so desirable a frame of mind. But as his voice was evidently growing weaker from the very excitement caused by these dreams of the past, at ten o'clock they advised him to retire. Fürstenau and Smart conducted him to his room. He bade the former good night, but kept Fürstenau, who was the only person whom he would allow to do little odd things for him. Fürstenau helped to undress him, and looked to see that the blister had not shifted from its proper place. Weber, after winding up his watch, said to him: "Now, my old friend, leave me to go to sleep." Fürstenau repeated his offer to have a bed made up in the room, but Weber would not hear of such a thing. He went with his friend as far as the door, which he shut after him, and then locked.

The friends he had left remained together till midnight, talking over the probable incidents of his journey, and seeking to devise some means of dissuading him from it. When they went out, they locked up to-gether Weber's window. He had not extinguished his light.

The next morning, early, one of Sir George Smart's servants knocked gently at Weber's door. Receiving no answer, he knocked more loudly, a thing he had never done before, as Weber slept very lightly. He then cried out for his master. The latter, suspecting what had happened, sent at once to fetch Fürstenau, who lived in the neighbourhood. The door was hastily burst open. A terrible silence reigned in the room, where the only sound was the ticking of the watch, which had been placed upon the table. Smart hurriedly pulled open the curtains, and Weber's pale face met his view. A smile played upon his lips. He was leaning on his right hand and appeared to be sleeping. A doctor was sent for instantly, and asked to bleed him. The latter took hold of his hand. All eyes were fixed upon him. Letting the hand fall again, he said: "It is no use. This person has been dead five hours!"

"He is not dead," said Fürstenau, closing his eyes; "he has returned to his fellows, the gentil and the wise!"

The news of Weber's death spread rapidly all over London. Marks of sympathy and regret were manifested everywhere, and the papers were never tired of singing the praises of the master, whose last work had been composed for England.

The Philharmonic Society headed the programme of its concert for the 12th of June with the "Dead March" from Handel's Saul, and the words: "As a Tribute to a departed Genius." On the 17th June, the day which had long before been fixed on for Weber's benefit at Covent Garden—the proceeds of which benefit went to swell the composer's estate—Drury Lane Theatre was closed so as not to interfere with the rival establishment. But this act of courtesy availed nothing, for the receipts barely covered the expenses. The public taste had already flocked to another idol.

A committee, headed by Smart, Moscheles, and Braham, was formed to manage the funeral. A notice appeared in the papers requesting persons desirous of joining the procession to come in mourning, and send a guinea and a half towards rendering the ceremony as solemn and grand as possible. The burial was at first to have taken place at Westminster, but the deceased composer's religion led to St. Mary's, Moorfields, being chosen, and his remains were consigned to a crypt there. A sub-committee, of which Lablache was chairman, undertook the musical part of the service; all the singers, as well as the members of the bands and choruses at Covent Garden and Drury Lane, responded to the call, and begged to have the honour of lending their assistance to this grand manifestation. But the size of the chapel did not allow the committee to accept all the offers made. Cramer, to whom this detail was confided, found himself, much to his regret, obliged to erase at least two-thirds of the names inscribed on the list.

The 15th June was fixed on for the burial, which resembled, in all respects, that of a person of the highest rank. The procession set out at nine o'clock in the morning. According to the English custom, it had a mediæval appearance, adding still more to the effect such lugubrious processions would otherwise produce. Heralds dressed in mourning, and pages led the way. Then came the hearse, drawn by six horses, and having on it Weber's family arms, and the simple word, "Resurgam" in gold letters. It was followed by sixteen mourning

* From the Guide Musical.

In its number for the 13th May, 1826, the Mercure de Londres, a French review, edited by P. Chatelain, announces a performance for the next day but one, at the French Theatre, of a romance, accompanied to the bills, "devait assister le célèbre auteur de Der Freschuitz" (sic) "Carl Maria von Weber." This performance, again according to the bills, was made up of "Les deux Cousins, ou l'Ecole du Scandale, vaudeville en trois actes, imité de la comédie The School for Scandal, de Sheridan; M. Bonnefils, comédie en un acte (de M. de Jouy); CARL MARIA WEBER en Voyage, petit apropos à l'occasion d'un grand compositeur, en un acte mêlé de musique." We have been unable to discover whether Weber went to witness the performance.—Note by the Ed. of the "Guide Musical."

coaches, and a countless number of private carriages, containing all the celebrities then residing in London. The clergy, headed by the Roman Catholic Bishop of Westminster, came to receive the body on its entrance into the chapel, and, at the same moment, the grandiose accents of Mozart's Requiem :—

"Requiem æternam dona eis, Domine!"

re-echoed beneath the vaulted roof to salute the great master in the name of that art of which he was so illustrious a representative.

Weber's last wish, his ardent desire to repose among those belonging to him, was not fulfilled. Various letters, at various periods, appealed to German patriotism to restore his ashes to their native land; but these isolated appeals met with only a feeble response, when, in 1841, the paper, the Europa, published an article, saying that: "It was now time to dig in German soil a tomb for the German bard." The article created a sensation, and, shortly after its publication, a committee was formed in Dresden to carry out the object it advocated. The Liederspiel here had the honour of contributing the first obolus to the national work, and other societies imitated their example. The subscriptions came in rapidly. Suddenly the Government completely damped the pious zeal of Weber's countrymen, by stating that permission to remove the body would be refused by England. Shortly afterwards, the Committee, having no longer any reason for continuing in existence, was dissolved.

Two years subsequently, Baron Max von Weber,* the composer's eldest son, being in London for the purpose of completing his scientific education, wrote to his mother, saying that, thanks to his influence and his high connections, he hoped to obtain the authorization they so ardently desired. On the receipt of this intelligence, which was confirmed a short time afterwards, a new Committee was formed, with Richard Wagner for chairman. Contributions were forwarded from all quarters to that devoted friend of Weber's family, who then occupied at Dresden the post which the composer of Der Freischutz had rendered celebrated. A few weeks later, the Committee declared the subscriptions closed.

On the 25th October, 1844, the "John Bull," bearing the precious remains, was moored at Hamburgh. The remains were solemnly received on reaching the composer's native land. Having been conveyed up to Dresden, they were placed on a vessel which was to transport them to the qual opposite the Theatre. The ceremony took place at night. All the bands, all the societies, and all the academies of the place were drawn upon the qual, as were, also, the deputations. The mortuary bark, bearing a catafalco, brilliantly lighted up, moved slowly along upon the river. When this bark reached the qual, the coffin, by means of an ingenious mechanical contrivance, rose of itself from among the torches. It was greeted by the cheers, a thousand times repeated, and by the applause of the immense crowd which lined the qual. The procession, constellated with countless torches, was immediately formed, and set out to the strains of a march composed by Herr Richard Wagner, on motives from Euryanthe. At the entrance to the cemetery were all the persons connected with the Theatre. At their head were Mdmes. Schröder-Devrient, Spatzer, and Gentiluomo. A short service was performed in the mortuary chapel, the torches were extinguished and the crowd dispersed. But there remained, in front of the mortuary, a poor woman, broken and aged by grief. She was supported by her son, who did not venture to disturb her profound sorrow, which burst forth with fresh intensity by the side of the beloved remains within the coffin.

Early the next day, the crowd returned to the cemetery, and the ceremony of inhumation began. After a majestic chorus by Wagner, and the last benediction, the composer was lowered into the tomb which already contained the body of Alexander, his youngest son, who had died in London a short time previously. Max von Weber threw the first spadeful of earth on the coffin; the persons nearest him imitated his example, and the tomb was filled with laurels and garlands.

Weber, "the German Bard," reposed in German soil.

Edmond Neukomm.

* Herr von Weber—who is an excellent musician, by the way—had the good taste not to embrace an artistic career. He profited by the example of Mozart's sons, who were friends of his father. He studied engineering, and now holds the position of Director-General of the Royal Railways of Saxony. After the Telegraphic Congress of Paris he was created a Chevalier of the Legion of Honour. Among other orders he is decorated with that of Saxony, which Count Vitzthum vainly endeavoured to procure for his father. He is an excellent writer, and, in addition to the work which serves as a basis to the present biographical sketch, and which is really a monument raised to his father's memory, he is the author of a great many romances and stories, though he is better known by his professional works, which are highly esteemed by his brother-engineers. He has also, published a remarkable book on Algeria, where he endeavoured to found German colonies. His son, Carl Maria, will be an engineer like himself. This young man studied at the Polytechnic School, Dresden.—Ed. Neukomm.

THE REVOLUTIONARY THEATRE OF FRANCE.

Few subjects can be found more interesting than this. During the French Revolution all kinds of social problems were solved, and among others, that, not previously attempted, of a perfectly free stage was dealt with. In early days of Greece even, the necessity was felt of some form of authority to be exercised over the stage. Writers, of all classes, from Plato downwards, have seen the abuses to which absolute license in theatrical affairs might lead. In the days of the Athenian comedy, accordingly, and in all days since, with the single exception of a short period during the French Revolution, some form of authority has been exercised. With the fall of the Bastille in Paris the censure ceased. Suard, who was then the censor, still exercised a pretended surveillance, but the discharge of his duties was confined to licensing every piece he had previously rejected. Not long was the experiment allowed to continue. One form of censure replaced another and did not prove less efficient. The tyranny of King Mob proved at least equal to that of King Law, and the voice of the people arrested more summarily the progress of a piece or the indiscretions of an actor than the most active and meddlesome of censors. During the time of the Revolution, however, a licence not before observable was witnessed. The pieces then produced were of a kind not previously or since exhibited, and the entire performances cast a light upon the history of that great movement of which the end is yet far beyond our ken. A history of the theatre during that period is, of course, a history of the changes of thought which attended the progress of the Revolution, and so correct are the indices afforded it would hardly be too much to say that from the plays produced and without aid from any other source, a full and fairly satisfactory and philosophical history of the French Revolution might be compiled.

Under ordinary conditions, the light cast by the stage upon history is very small. A sense of the danger attending any theatrical meddling with politics is generally experienced, and a tolerably complete approach to impartiality, for the stage, in other countries, is purchased by its observing rigidly the law of non-interference with religion and politics. Timidity, accordingly, for the most part, the stage follows at some distance the progress of political events, and the fact that a political struggle is referred to in comedy may be accepted as proof that all excitement connected with it at that period was over. During the progress of the French Revolution one period alone is found in which the vast majority of the pieces produced were political. This opinion became the real censor of the stage. Sauterne and his Sans-culotte attended every performance, and if anything was said derogatory from the dignity of his Majesty the People, took care it was immediately expunged. When this tyranny was at its height, when the reign of terror was established in France, when the penalty for any action construable by a refinement of ingenuity into disloyalty was immediate and final, the dramatists, naturally, were panic-stricken. Considerable courage was, indeed, necessary to write a drama in which a heedless line, or one even capable of misinterpretation, consigned to a certainty the author's head to the guillotine. While, accordingly, the terrible théâtre rouge was being exhibited in the streets of Paris, those theatres that still kept opened their doors gave quiet and inane operas. Such a more serious contrast could scarcely be afforded than that of the grim tragedy without and the prettily warbled love-notes of shepherds and shepherdesses within the theatres. To show how far the public supervision was exercised, a single anecdote will suffice. In a play on a scriptural subject, that of Susanna, an objection was made to the elders passing sentence upon her—"Vous êtes ses accusateurs, vous ne pouvez pas être ses juges.' in these words the audience saw an allusion to the trial of Louis XVI., then proceeding. A tremendous storm was aroused, and the author was obliged to make ample amends for a line that might (or might not) have been perfectly void of malicious intention.

Very simple works followed the first capture of the Bastille. So sudden was that event that the revolutionary dramatists were scarcely prepared for it. They would otherwise have had pieces ready to commemorate adequately their triumph. Those writers who first produced plays bearing upon the altered state of affairs were as a rule timid, and their efforts were merely translations of cheap romances or the fraternity between people of unequal station was sometimes the climax of any interest. A nobleman allowing his daughter to marry a workman, or his son to marry a daughter of one of the people, was a not uncommon denouement to a drama. Marie Joseph Chenier, brother to André Chenier, the celebrated poet, was the first man to bring upon the stage a work thoroughly impregnated with republican ideas. His Charles IX.; ou, La Saint Barthelemy, a tragedy, to which after its success he added the title, L'école des Rois, was sent to Suard, who read it but declined to authorize its production. This was, indeed, not the first time it had come before him. His permission for its performance was timidly withheld, and he was backed in his demand by the commune. But the public in their mood of triumph were not likely to be baulked in their pleasure. They insisted upon its performance, and Suard and the com-mone gave in. Charles IX. was full of incidents and phrases upon which the populace could seize. In Charles IX. monarchy was assailed, and in the cardinal religion. The monarch sat upon the stage and fired upon his defenceless subjects, while the cardinal exhorted the troops to the murder of the Huguenots, and blessed and consecrated the weapons with which their murder was to be accomplished. Though considered, when first played, a work of great boldness, Charles IX., as might be expected, was but tame besides works which were to follow. So long as Marie Antoinette and Louis were alive a species of antagonism was exhibited. Pieces the end of which was unmistakably to incite animosity against the King or the Autrichienne, were played at one theatre, and were followed at another by dramas exhorting to mercy and to the suppression of disorder. Some of the later pieces were exceptionally bold, and were produced at a time when the courage of author and actor must have been well tried.

While the result of the trial of Louis was yet doubtful, Léon de Laya gave at the Théâtre Français his Amis de Lois, a piece in which Frenchmen were strongly urged to resist the attempt that was made to lead them into the paths of cruelty and brutality. This piece incurred, of course, the admiration of Santerre, and its performance was after a time prohibited. We are not sure that the pieces in which the crusade against the revolutionary government is maintained are not the most interesting of the epoch. Martainville, and after him Picard and Duval, wrote appropriate sketches upon the law concerning "the suspected." This terrible "loi des suspects," a measure so strong that it frightened the very men by whom it was proposed and carried into effect, was the subject of able ridicule. The piece of Martainville, produced at the Variétés, the 14th Pluviôse, An III. (23rd April, 1795), showed how the inhabitants of a village being told to furnish a list of the "suspects," could not understand the phrase, and furnished, for honour and reward, a list of their worthiest citizens. The irony of this piece is strong. In the second piece, Il faut surveiller les Suspects, a government agent is introduced smoking a pipe and boasting of his employment. "I am a Jacobin, and am called Gracchus Courantin; I am agent of the government, yet the commune is not under arms to receive me. Very well. I will take tempest in which France then was, myself by destroying it. (Taking his notes.) I am not dissatisfied with myself. In the next township I have arrested fifty people; seventeen women, ten rich farmers, three scholars, and the rest nobles and priests. I have established three prisons on the model of those in Paris. I have drunk delicious wines without paying for them. I have a portfolio fill of assignats. I drink the wine of the aristocrats. Vive le Republique." It required courage, amounting almost to heroism, to write or to speak these words in the tempest in which France then was.

Before the Republic gave way to the Empire a large production of the plays acted had a bearing upon England. It was a constant dream of the Republicans to cross the Channel, fraternize with the English, who were supposed to be ripe for rebelling their coming, and end all by serving George III. as Louis had been served. Some pieces, in which Grey, Fox, and Sheridan, are represented singing the "Ca Ira" in caps of liberty, while George III. is carried through the streets in a cage with other like matters, are very droll.

CARLSRUHE.—Herr Ed. Devrient has resigned his post as Director-General of the Grand-Ducal Theatre. The Grand-Duke has conferred on him the Commander's Cross of the Zähringer Löon, a noble heraldic animal, of which the Grand-Duke is the legitimate metaphorical Van Ambrugh.

DRESDEN.—There was some talk of getting up a festival to celebrate the fact that, on the 6th inst., half a century will have elapsed since F. Schneider first produced his Weltgericht at the Gewandhaus, Leipsic. On the 13th April following it was performed in the University Church of the same city.

BRUSSELS.—"Er liebt mich—liebt mich nicht." "He loves me—loves me not," says Margaret in the garden. "He'll bring it out—he'll not produce it," says the theatre-goer in this capital, as, utterly bewildered by the course pursued by the manager of the Théâtre de la Monnaie, he plucks to pieces, thought by thought, his power of prophecy with reference to Herr R. Wagner's Lohengrin. We stated in a late number of the Musical World that there were grave doubts as to whether this opera, after all, would be promised for ever so long, would see the footlights at the above theatre after all. These doubts are still entertained, and lets freely taken that the admirers of Herr Wagner's music (as it is called) will have to borrow the line, "Leb wohl mein, lieber schwann!" ("Farewell, dear swan!") from the first act, and, speaking in their own persons, apply it to the celebrated bird, even before they have seen him. Meanwhile, the management have produced Signor Ricci's opera, Une Folie à Rome, but it has not achieved a very decided success. It is true that the artists were far from doing it justice.

ST. THOMAS'S CHORAL SOCIETY.

Usually concerts given by local societies for local objects do not repay attention. This, however, cannot be said of a performance which took place in St. James's Hall, last Thursday week, under the direction of Mr. Randegger, who brought forward a new but well-trained body of voices—the St. Thomas's Choral Society—in connection with a programme of singular interest. The result was an exceptional audience such as is only attracted by exceptional means. A symphony in G minor, the work of Etienne Henri Méhul, opened the proceedings, and was performed for the first time in seventeen years. To the majority certainly the French composer, who held so prominent a place through the stormy years of the Republic and Empire, is barely known by name. The fate has befallen him common to so many excellent masters unfortunate enough to be contemporary with the giants of music. True, English amateurs of the better informed order are more or less acquainted with Joseph and with the interesting programme overture to Une Chasse de Jeune Henri; but, apart from these, Méhul's forty-two operas are out of sight and mind. As regards his symphonies, orchestral concert-givers seem to have forgotten them. If we may judge by the composer's biography in M. Felix Clement's Musiciens Célèbres, they are as little honoured in their native country. M. Clement, while devoting ample space to the "Chant du Départ" and the "Hymne à la Raison," briefly and contemptuously dismisses the symphonies as "compositions froides qui firent assister le public au déclin pour mieux dire définitif d'un grand maître." It would appear from this that M. Clement knew nothing at all about them; and if so with him, how with the general body of his compatriots? Very few of Thursday's audience, we hope, would style the symphony in G minor a "composition froide," because, as a matter of fact, it is distinguished by symmetry, tunefulness, and a masterly working out of ideas only found in the best examples of the school of Haydn and Mozart. We might bring forward portions of each movement in proof; but it will suffice to mention the andante and the scherzetto, which are in the highest degree excellent. Let us hope that, having now heard one of Méhul's symphonies, we shall soon hear others. Music of so good a sort repays not less than it deserves attention. Mr. Randegger's Medea followed. This strange and effective scena was first performed at Leipsic by Madame Rudersdorff; and next at Norwich by Mdlle. Tietjens, on each occasion successfully. Good luck has now attended it for the third time. In fairness we must credit this last result equally to the music and the singer. Madame Rudersdorff, who has rarely been heard to more advantage. She did her work magnificently, alternating dramatic energy and tender sentiment in a manner beyond reproach. Never was recall more fairly earned. The serenade by Mozart, which attracted some notice at the late Norwich Festival, was another feature in Thursday's concert. We have already said all that is necessary about this trifle; and there only remains to point out that, though a trifle, it ought to be played well, or not at all.

The second part was wholly taken up by Sullivan's Prodigal Son, in which Mdme. Rudersdorff, Mdlle. Drasdil, Mr. Byron, and Mr. Winn appeared as soloists. We are glad to see Mr. Sullivan's work strengthening its hold upon public favour, a result sure to follow performances like that under notice. Mr. Randegger's choristers acquitted themselves so well that it was not once needful to remember the youthfulness of their association. Even "They went astray," and "O that men would therefore praise the Lord," were delivered with almost entire correctness. That the St. Thomas's Choral Society has by no means wasted the first year of its existence is, therefore, tolerably clear. Among the more successful solos were "O that thou hadst hearkened" (Mdme. Rudersdorff); and "Love not the world" (Mdlle. Drasdil). Mr. Byron, who accepted his task at short notice, strengthened the impression made by his recent singing in The Seasons; Mr. Winn was hardly less satisfactory. Mr. Randegger conducted throughout with marked ability.

A STRANGE BOUQUET.—As a pretty general rule it may be asserted that the walls in the drawing-rooms, or salons, of celebrated artists are ornamented with wreaths, medallions, and other tokens of triumphs achieved. But nothing of the kind is visible in Mad. Alboni's drawing-room. One thing, however, rather astonishes the visitor, and that is a collection, under a glass shade, of tufts, such as are used to ornament the shakos worn by French soldiers. These tufts are arranged in the form of a bouquet, and the following story is connected with them:—On one occasion that Mad. Alboni sang at the Theatre in Metz, she raised the audience to a more than ordinary degree of enthusiasm. The stage was inundated with bouquets, wreaths, and—shako-tufts. The last were flung by the fair artist's martial admirers, who had not flowers or wreaths, any more than money for the purchase thereof, but who, for all that, were quite as ecstatic as the civilian spectators. Mad. Alboni had all the tufts carefully collected, and they were the only tokens she carried away with her of her triumph at Metz

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

Respecting the first appearance, this season, of Madame Schumann, at the Monday Popular Concerts, the Globe comes across the second trio by Mendelssohn for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, and writes as follows:—

"In Mendelssohn's trio in C minor, the two accomplished performers (Madame Schumann and Herr Joachim) appeared together, the party being completed by Herr Daubert. As might have been expected, their performance separately left little to be desired. Of the ensemble, however, it is impossible to say as much. Madame Schumann played on one of the most recent specimens of those formidable pianofortes, which, however suited or needed to hold their own against an orchestra of modern magnitude, are altogether out of proportion in intensity with the most sonorous specimens that can be found of the violin class, even in the hands of a Joachim or a Wilhelmj. A wider departure from the intention of a composer than the combination of one of these monstrous instruments with a single violin and violoncello could hardly be made, unless it were substituting a cornet-à-piston for the one or a trombone for the other, supposing for a moment that it were possible to execute the violin and violoncello passages upon them. For a solo, a piano—or rather a forte—of this class may or may not be well suited; any inconvenience attending it is confined to him or her who plays upon it. If such instruments, however, are finally admitted into concerted music, it is not difficult to foresee the eventful result—the doubling, trebling, or quadrupling of the concurrent parts: in other words, the annihilation of chamber music. For this, it is to be hoped, the world is not yet prepared, though how soon the preparation may be completed it would be rash to say."

The Globe is mysterious, but doubtless has a hidden (esoteric) meaning.

Ash Wednesday and the Theatres.

The following sensible letter from "A London Manager" appeared in Wednesday's Daily Telegraph:—

"Sir,—Belonging, as I do, to an overmuch licensed and supervised class, I venture, with great diffidence, to utter a mild protest against the compulsory closing of theatres on Ash Wednesday. To-night the refined and intellectual entertainment which I am in the habit of placing before the public is suspended by an order of the Lord Chamberlain, and my patrons are thrown into the arms of those who provide what I have been taught to regard as a much lower form of amusement. The two hundred and eighty intelligent beings in my employment are, with two exceptions, deprived of this night's work and their night's salary, the exceptions being a young lady with a voice, who will sing at three concerts in the course of the evening, and an active young pupil comedian, who will perform at a country theatre about one hundred miles from London. Some of the less fortunate members of my company have asked me why the law compels us to take a holiday in the stormy months of February or March, while the Crystal Palace represents the opéra bouffe of Barbe-Bleue, and most of the great music halls and casinos remain open. They are scarcely consoled when I tell them, that places licensed by the magistrates have been allowed to break the strict letter of the law with impunity, while theatres licensed by the Lord Chamberlain have been ruled with more unbending severity. The Church has, doubtless, still much to do with these Lenten prohibitions, and yet the Church is not above drawing some portion of its sustenance from the playhouse. I pay about two hundred pounds a year in Church and Rector's rates, and have never even had a prayer offered up for the success of my entertainment."

Herr Raff at the "Palace."

In its notice of last Saturday's Crystal Palace concert the Pall Mall Gazette speaks thus of Herr Raff's music:—

"An adagietto and scherzo from Raff's Suite in C were in the programme for the first time. Joachim Raff, who, we are assured, 'has a certain fame on the Continent, and is in every respect a composer of our day'—a doubtful compliment by-the-bye—belongs to the class Mr. Manns delights to patronise. He produces much of an 'advanced' German kind, and varies this occupation by writing in defence of his faith, and of its prophet, Wagner. No wonder is, therefore, that Mr. Manns did not turn the light of Raff upon us long ago. But, judging from the movements played on Saturday, the loss arising from Raff's absence has not been serious. True, there are features in his music of such merit as belongs to occasional tunefulness, and to a picturesque use of the orchestra. But these are neutralised by other features of an opposite sort. Herr Raff seems one of those men who so rarely lay hold of a melody that, having done so, they immediately get all they can out of it by putting it to the 'question.' There is an example in the adagietto, where pretty if not original themes are tortured to an insupportable degree. Again, both movements display an almost feverish anxiety to be original, which in the absence of adequate power only leads to 'great cry and little wool.' The ostentatious challenge to attention of the scherzo, for example, is to the actual result what the gorgeous 'canvas' of Mr. Magsman's show was to Chops and his fellow-phenomena. Mr. Manns hopes to introduce the whole work; but how far this feeling is shared by others remains very doubtful."

Chevalier Balfe.

Apropos of the honour recently conferred upon Mr. Balfe by the Emperor of the French, the Daily Telegraph of Monday said:—

"We have a Sir Michael Costa; we may have, some day, a Sir Jules Benedict; but the Gazette has not yet chronicled the creation of Sir Michael Balfe. The genial composer of so many delightful operas, the man of many melodies, the English Auber, has long since passed the meridian of life; he has fought a good fight, and has rendered bright services to the muse of his charming and humanizing art; but, in his own country, away from the ranks of his profession, he is nobody. He is not even an Academician—for Musical Academy, in the proper sense of the term, England has none. The establishment in Tenterden Street is merely a musical school. Yet has Mr. Balfe, quite ignored and unrecognised by authority in his native land, been just raised to the chivalric grade. A telegram informs us that the Emperor Napoleon has conferred the Cross of the Legion of Honour on the author of the Bohemian Girl. As Mr. Balfe looks at the glittering bauble, and fastens the ribbon to his button-hole, he may derive additional pleasure from the reflection that he will not be allowed to wear his decoration in England without express permission from the Crown; and that such permission is, as a rule, only granted to members of the military and naval services. Perhaps, if Mr. Balfe had been bandmaster of the 5th Foot, he might be permitted to wear his cross, and might have earned a few war medals besides; but, as it is, he must keep the Legion of Honour for the Tuileries. At St. James's such a sight as the unauthorized badge on the breast of a civilian, and that civilian a musician, would fill the whole of the Lord Chamberlain's department with horror."

PROPOSED OPERA FOR BOMBAY.

The following letter appeared in the Times of India:—

"Sir,—May I venture to enquire whether any steps have lately been taken with reference to a new Opera-house for Bombay? It is unnecessary to say that the present Grant Road Theatre is unworthy of the dignity and importance of this thriving and prosperous city, and the locality is far from being the most choice and convenient.

"In Calcutta, the Opera has become quite an institution of society; and although they boast of no permanent Operahouse, their present structure answers every purpose until such time they can afford to erect a pucka building. Is there, then, no public spirit, no energy, no enterprise amongst the musical society of Bombay to make a stir in this matter. Many months ago I was associated with several friends in trying to promote the interests of Signor Steffani in establishing a yearly operatic season here, but our united efforts signally failed. Since then I have had the pleasure of attending several operas in Calcutta, and I now feel the more convinced that it requires only a certain amount of determination and support to place Bombay on a footing with the sister presidency in this one particular. The residents of Bombay are yearly increasing, and immediately railway communication is established with Calcutta and the North-west, a constant stream of strangers, &c., will be passing through here, and hence a great support may be calculated on from this fact.

"A general description of the Operahouse at Calcutta may perhaps enable us to judge how far it is practicable to erect a similar building here. The structure is only temporary, and built entirely of wood and corrugated iron; its external design has no pretensions whatever, but its interior is carved out in a simple and effective manner. The plan is well arranged, both for seeing and ventilation, and considering it to be only a temporary building, it has a most substantial and genuine appearance when lighted up.

"The Governor having recently paid a visit to the Opera at Calcutta, we may doubtless calculate on his Excellency's support both pecuniarily, and also in providing an appropriate piece of ground in a central locality; and let us hope that no time may be lost in giving effect to what I have suggested, and that arrangements be made with Signor Steffani, of Milan (who so ably conducted the opera here of 1866), to bring out a first-rate company for next season. I would suggest that the building in question should not only be the Operahouse and Theatre, but also a place for holding choral and musical meetings and concerts. The floor might also be constructed so as to admit of being converted into a ball-room where the assemblies, &c., might be held. If these few suggestions are the means of stirring up the Bombayites to do like unto the Calcuttaites, I shall have no occasion to regret signing myself—Yours truly,

W. P."

Darmstadt.—Herr Niemann has been singing here.

Leipsic.—At the concert for the benefit of the Orchestra-Pension-Fund, the programme included, among other things, Sterndale Bennett's Overture to Thomas Moore's Paradise and the Peri. It was much applauded. Müdle. Emma Brandes, from Schwerin, played Beethoven's Piano Concerto in E flat major, besides smaller pieces by Mendelssohn, Schumann, and Heller. Mdme. Peschka-Leutner sang some songs by Mozart and Winter, and the orchestra performed Hector Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" Overture.

THREATENED.

What is threatened? Only the existence of an ancient Festival; and the credit of a dean and chapter.

Musical readers will, doubtless, remember that just before the Worcester Festival of 1866, Earl Dudley showed a sudden and violent repugnance to its celebration. As far as repugnance goes the noble lord was not alone. Many other good and pious men cannot persuade their consciences to accept musical entertainments in a cathedral. For the most part, however, they are satisfied to hold aloof from the affair. If they are not for the Festival, they are not against it, in the sense of taking active measures. But passive opposition did not suit the ardent zeal of Lord Dudley. He looked about him for some weapon wherewith to demolish the sacrilegious institution which the last piety of 150 years has encouraged. Looking about, his eye lighted upon his money-bags and kindled with the satisfaction money-bags can so readily excite. Here was something more formidable than public protests, or private influence, and Lord Dudley lost no time in setting it to work. So an offer was made to give the Charity supported by the Festival, as much cash as the Festival was likely to bring, provided the Cathedral performances were abandoned. Such an offer, coming from such a quarter, at a time when it was needful to conciliate long purses for the sake of Cathedral restoration, was a potent affair, and the Festival's supporters were naturally anxious. As all the world knows, the offer was declined, the Festival took place, and proved a greater success than might have been expected with Lord Dudley and his brethren everywhere praying against it. His first assault beaten off, the noble lord waited his opportunity for another. Meanwhile, he gave liberally to the Restoration Fund. Before the Festival of last year nothing was heard of Lord Dudley, and sanguine folk imagined he had become reconciled to a passive attitude. Not so, however. That great champion of cathedral sanctity has just made a second, and more formidable attack, on a weak point of his enemy's defence. The dean and chapter of Worcester have a noble edifice within £10,000 of complete renovation, and we need not say that, in such a case, the last £10,000 is the most difficult to obtain. Seeing this, Lord Dudley now offers that sum, tied to his old condition—the giving up of the Festival. The bait is a tempting one, and we feel much for the intended victims, because it is put before them in the name of zeal for the House of the Lord, which they are officially bound to respect and encourage. At present the dean and chapter are deliberating, and while they debate the matter, it behoves the friends of the Festival to be up and doing on their side of the question.

Happily, the Festival has friends of a sort which must give Lord Dudley some disquiet. The belted earl put his lance in rest, but when his trumpeters sounded defiance, an answer came from the direction of Westwood Park, and Sir John Pakington is now seen "pricking across the plain" armed, very strongly, with common sense and good feeling. What will be the issue of the fight between the golden earl and the doughty baronet?

As to the side on which public sympathy lies there can be no more doubt than as to the course which interest, as well as duty, suggests to the dean and chapter. If the Cathedral authorities swallow Lord Dudley's bait, it will be said of them, not without good reason, that either they abandoned a good institution for money down; or that for years they supported a bad one from which they could only be induced to separate by bribes. SWELL.

Three Combinations to Great Organ.

The instrument was opened on the 23rd ult., by Mr. J. J. Monk, who played an admirable selection of music, including Bach's great fugue in G minor; march in C from Ousley's St. Polycarp; offertoire in F (Wely), and the march from Costa's Naaman. A local paper says:—"The organ is a really splendid instrument, and its manifold beauties were ably displayed."

PROVINCIAL.

BELFAST.—A correspondent writes as below:—

"The Monday Popular Concert at the Ulster Hall was fully equal to anticipation. Madame Thaddeus Wells was in excellent voice. In 'Ye Little Birds' (Bishop), she was encored, as well as in 'The Bailiff's Daughter of Islington.' The flute solos of Mr. Henry Nicholson were a treat, and did more than sustain his reputation, as one of the best performers on that instrument. His solos —Fantasia on Airs from Benedict's Opera, The Lily of Killarney and 'Drouet's Variations on 'Rule, Britannia'—were both encored. Mr. Collier, as usual, displayed the power of an adept on the grand organ. The attendance was not so large as it should have been."

EDINBURGH.—We read in the Scotsman of Monday last:—

"At the organ performance on Friday afternoon, in the Music Class-room, Professor Oakeley played the following music, prefaced by a few remarks on some of the pieces:—

"Prelude, and Fugue on the notes B A C H, C. P. E. Bach; Air and Chorus, 'The marvellous work' (Creation), Haydn; Andante in F, string quartet, No. 2, Mozart; Theme and Five Variations (Septuor), Beethoven; Adagio, Scotch Symphony, No. 3, Mendelssohn; Andante, No. 2 of second set of Organ Pieces, S. S. Wesley. Choruses by Handel; 'How excellent Thy name, O Lord' (Saul), 'May no rash intruder,' Nightingale Chorus (Solomon), 'Let their celestial concerts all unite' (Samson).

"The theme and variations in Beethoven's septet would, the Professor remarked, be heard on Saturday afternoon at the last of the excellent concerts of chamber music; and the adagio in the Scotch Symphony may, to some extent recal the 12th of this month. The second number of Dr. Wesley's Organ Pieces consists of a melody in F sharp minor, with a light variation introducing a finte stop with effect. Mr. Oakeley announced that his next lecture on Mediæval Music would be given on Friday."

CANTERBURY.—The following is from a correspondent:—

"The Corn Exchange was completely filled last week at a concert for a local charity. The principal attraction was Mrs. Frances Tallourd, the well-known amateur vocalist, who is never tired of giving her valuable services in aid of the worthiest of causes. The audience, duly appreciating her talent, warmly applauded each of her songs, especially 'The Lover and the Bird,' which they would have willingly heard thrice in succession had the singer been willing."

BRESLAU.—Middle. Marie Krebs appeared at the tenth Soirée of the Association for Chamber Music, and played various pieces by Beethoven, Schumann, Bach, Chopin, and Liszt.—Herr Bernhard Hahn, organist of the Cathedral, died on the 16th ult., aged forty-eight. Herr Hahn enjoyed a high reputation in Germany for his playing and compositions.

Lines for Music.

THEN AND NOW.

A shading oak—a slope of green,
A river gliding by;
And coming up the winding path—
Half hidden from the eye—
A maid, in all the bloom of youth,
Resplendent in her grace,
Whom I await, with beating heart,
At our old trysting place.

And there, beneath the spreading tree,
We linger many an hour,
Dreaming sweet dreams of boundless hope,
Love's dreams! (O precious dower!)
Her dear face rests upon my breast,
We speak with murmured breath,
Those golden words, from soul to soul,
Which triumph over death!

I passed the spot not long ago,
The stately Oak stands there!
The river still rolls swiftly on
Beside the green slope fair.
But up the shaded, winding path,
There comes, Ah! never more!
That Form unto our trysting place,
As in the days of yore.

A WANDERING MUSICIAN.

LAST week it was our duty to have a word with Le Ménestrel; now, an English contemporary demands attention, but with regard to a very different matter. The Musician has just delivered itself of a long article on "English Musical Criticism," wherein fallacious assumption and error in matters of fact jostle each other to the exclusion of well nigh everything else. The article tries to show that the criticism of our daily press is "insular" and narrow; that it is unable to accept novelty; and that in furtherance of its prejudices it does not hesitate to bluster "progressive music" out of England. Illustrating all this, our contemporary refers to the cases of Gounod and Wagner, the first of whom, we are told, was "kept out of England for ten years," and the second is even now a victim of "arrogant and wanton misrepresentation." It delights us to add that the Musician grants the critics to be free from bad faith and sinister motive, because thereby its first gratuitous assumption is made plainer, which assumption is this:—the music of Gounod, of Wagner, and of Schumann (who, by-the-bye, is dragged in), is progressive music. It may surprise the Musician to learn that we, ourselves, altogether decline to grant this premiss; and, "bad faith" and "sinister motive" being absent, it follows that the critics of the "dailies" do the same. That which the Musician takes for granted is really the point about which battle must be waged. Instead of scolding the critics for blustering progressive music out of England, our contemporary should prove that the music in question is progressive. If it succeeds in doing this, we may safely promise that the critics will lay down their weapons, and take all the composers of the future to their arms.

Now let us turn to the Musician's errors in matters of fact. First, we are told that concert reports show "a certain air of mutual dependence which always reads to us a little debilitating." Our contemporary should have clearly explained what is to be understood by "a certain air of mutual dependence," and should, moreover, have fortified his position by examples. Our own experience tallies not at all with that of the Musician. We detect no mutual "leaning" on the part of the Times and the Post. The writers for the Daily News and the Pall Mall Gazette have little in common; while those of the Standard, Globe, and Daily Telegraph each pursues a course entirely its own. Such is our conviction; such, perhaps, may be our mistake. Nevertheless, we hold to it so long as the Musician does not condescend to particulars.

Again, the Musician is befogged about a matter having a personal bearing, and, therefore, one as to which it should have been specially careful. After alluding to the "double literary life" of some critics, our contemporary goes on to speak of a recent article on Wagner, in the Pall Mall Gazette, and says that the identity of this critic is "easy enough of detection to those acquainted but moderately with the London press." Is it, indeed! Then we, who have, at least, the moderate acquaintance referred to, must be hopelessly blind, for we cannot light upon the smallest clue to the identity our contemporary beholds so plainly. This, however, we do know—that the Musician has made a gross mistake, and based upon it a misleading assertion.

Once more, the Musician speaks of "a pen which has the run of the two most influential organs of the daily press."—"Such tricks hath strong imagination—that, if it would but apprehend some joy, it comprehends some bringer of that joy." In like manner the Musician, wanting to prove its case, imagined this wonderful pen. Do not believe in it, good Reader, for it is but a creature of our contemporary's active fancy. There is no such pen; and the argument growing out of its supposed existence is a delusion and a snare.

Here we leave the Musician, having given it enough to meditate upon during the current month. Let us pray that our contemporary may see the evil of mistaking fancies for facts; and of rushing blindly into a discussion about the details of which it knows next to nothing.

AMSTERDAM.—At the first performance of his Sancta Cecilia, Herr G. A. Heinze had the order of the Iron Crown conferred on him by the King of Holland.

BONN.—No one having been found to purchase the late Professor Otto Jahn's musical library and collection of music in a lump, they will be sold in separate lots by auction, on the 4th April.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

In our last we announced the merited honour conferred upon Mr. Balfe by Napoleon III. We are now able to give the text of the note in which the Ministre des Beaux-Arts conveyed his Majesty's pleasure to our distinguished composer:—

"Monsieur,—J'ai l'honneur de vous informer que, par décret en date du 18 de ce mois, l'Empereur a bien voulu vous nommer Chevalier de la Légion d'Honneur. Je me félicite d'avoir proposé à sa Majesté, pour cette distinction, un compositeur dont les œuvres tiennent depuis longtemps, un rang distingué au répertoire des principales scènes lyriques de l'Europe.—Recevez, etc.,

M. Richard."

Mr. Balfe must feel that the value of his new distinction is enhanced by the graceful manner of its offering.

A contemporary, who lately made himself conspicuous in defence of Mr. Hugo Pierson's music, and who accused everybody holding an adverse opinion of all sorts of high crimes and misdemeanours, has just turned upon his idol and smashed it. Reviewing a Te Deum and Benedictus of Mr. Pierson's, our contemporary uses the following expressions:—"The failure is conspicuous;" "we regret that he should ever have attempted to set the words before us;" "passages of the commonest description, without any apparent design or cohesion;" "mere Christy Minstrel music;" "a vulgarity which is simply astounding." Here, truly, is a more wonderful "translation" than that of Bully Bottom: Poor Mr. Pierson, his "Ek ta, Bevan" is, doubtless, come from the depths of an anguished soul, at receiving this "unkindest cut of all." As regards our contemporary, we shall not draw a parallel between him and certain Africans who are in the habit of thrashing their gods.

Herr Scaria of the Royal Operahouse, Dresden, can certainly not be accused of idleness in the exercise of his profession. On the 11th February, Saturday, he sang in Der Freischütz, and on Sunday in the Waffenschmid. On the Monday, he appeared at Breslau as Marcello in Les Huguenots; on Tuesday he sang as a concert, and, on Wednesday, he sustained the part of Falstaff in Nicolai's Lustige Weiber. Immediately after the performance, he rushed off to the railway station, and was at Dresden, for rehearsal, by nine o'clock on Thursday morning. On Friday, he sang the part of the Burgomaster in Czaar und Zimmermann. On Saturday, he sang in Der Waffenschmid, and, on Monday, in Fidelio. On Wednesday, he was at Gotha, singing Mephisto in Faust; on Friday, he appeared at Weimar, as Falstaff, and, on Saturday, in the same town, as the Cardinal in La Juive. On the following Monday, he sang at a Court Concert in Meiningen; and on Tuesday, at a concert of the Euterpe Society in Leipsic. On Wednesday and Thursday, he sang again in Breslau; and, lastly, on Friday, in Dresden, and there, as the Bishop said to the Earl of Rochester, we leave him.

SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS.

Although Mr. Wood has withdrawn the orchestra from these concerts, the programmes show a strong infusion of the classical element. Last Saturday, for example, the performance began with Neukomm's once admired Septuor for wind instruments, to which Messrs. Rockstro, Crosier, Lazarus, Catchpole, Wotton, Bosworth, and Smith did every justice. With this work was also given (first time in London) a portion of Mozart's serenade for oboes, clarionets, corni di bassetto, bassoons (two of each), four horns, and contra-bassoon. Mr. Crosier was much applauded after a fantasia by Lafi for the oboe; and Herr Wilhelmj displayed his truly magnificent great powers as a violinist in Ernst's inimitable "Airs Hongrois," and David's Fantaisie Russe. That Herr Wilhelmj is among the greatest violinists of the world there can be little doubt. Mendelssohn's overture for wind instruments concluded the concert, and was well given under Mr. Henry Leslie's direction. The vocalists were Miss Clari Frazer, Mdlle. Palmerini, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Herr Carl Bohrer. Miss Frazer did her work pleasingly; Miss Palmer—we beg her pardon—Mdlle. Palmerini—should study hard for a long time, and then re-appear; as for Herr Bohrer, he was encored in "Non più Andral," and thus made an encouraging début. Mr. Sims Reeves, sang Balfe's "Lady Hildred" (encored), and "Come into the garden, Maud," with all his customary and exquisite taste. This concert ended the season. We understand, however, that a new series will be commenced when Mr Wood's operatic tourists re-appear in town.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERT.

An unusually large audience attended Saturday's concert and heard the following selection:—

Overture, "Les deux Journées"...	Cherubini.
Sonata for organ solo in F minor (No. 1)—Mr. F. Archer	Mendelssohn.
Air, "With plaintive notes" (Samson)—Madame Sherrington	Handel.
Adagietto and Scherzo from Suite in C	Raff.
Prelude and Fugue (E minor)—Mr. Archer	F. S. Bach.
Oratorio, Mount of Olives—Madame Sherrington, Mr. G. Perren, Mr. Winn, and the Crystal Palace Choir	Beethoven.

An opportunity of improving acquaintance with the prelude to Les deux Journées is seldom afforded, for what reason would be hard to say, unless, as the opera is neglected, it might appear invidious to honour the overture. The overture is worthy of honour, nevertheless, as a masterly work, full of dramatic force, and hardly less distinguished by episodes of Mozart-like grace. It was well played, but coldly received, for the reason, perhaps, that its audience had not discrimination enough to recognize its beauties, and had not heard it often enough to know it by heart. The two movements from Raff's Suite also failed to excite enthusiasm, although the adagietto is sometimes pretty, and the scherzo always so "very original"—we quote "A. M."—not to be serious. Herr Raff's knowledge of the orchestra evidently serves him well, and he is not afraid to go far out of the beaten path after ideas. But good colouring of strange figures does not command instant appreciation, and we wait further experience. Mr. Archer's performance of both the sonata and fugue was very masterly. Using his instrument with surprising facility and unvarying correctness, he added to these qualifications a power of expression rarely brought to bear upon an organ. The finale to the sonata, and the whole of the fugue were played in a manner which must have excited the highest admiration among those best acquainted with the difficulties overcome. It is long since the organ has spoken to equal effect, and we care not how soon it speaks again after the same manner. Madame Sherrington's song was well sung but—with all respect to Handel—scarcely worth the singing. We need not say much about the Mount of Olives. The music is pretty well known and admired, while the performance was, on the whole, satisfactory. Madame Sherrington, Mr. Perren, and Mr. Winn, did their best, and the chorus were not unworthy of association with them.

PEDAL AND SPOT STROKE.

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

Sir,—As I see you take a great interest in, and write a good deal about, the Monday Popular Concerts, may I, as a very old subscriber, beg you to use whatever influence you may have to persuade the director to make one of the famous German pianists play Beethoven's sonata in B flat, Op. 106, which has hitherto only been attempted in Mr. Chappell's admirable entertainments, and each time by an English artist, who, of course (being English), is not fit to hold a candle to any of the great German pianists.

My only stipulation I would make is one similar to that upon which amateurs of billiards are used to insist whenever a match is got up for any other billiard player against Mr. Cook, Jun.—viz., that a certain mechanical advantage should be waived. Once on the "spot stroke," there is no getting Mr. Cook off it; and once on the pedal, a famous German pianist adheres to it with equal pertinacity (witness the last movement of one of Beethoven's finest sonatas, a fortnight since). Now, if it was only arranged that the great pedal should be muzzled during the fugued finale ("a tre voce, con alcune licenze"), I think that a most interesting and instructive display would be the result. Pray assist me in this matter, and count upon the gratitude of—Yours, very faithfully, Lavender Pitt.

Everybody interested in organs and organ-building will be glad to learn that Messrs. Robert Cocks & Co. are about publishing, by subscription, a new and considerably augmented edition of "The Organ; its History and Construction, by E. J. Hopkins and E. F. Rimbault." The new edition will contain important matter bearing upon recent improvements, as well as show a thorough revision of what has already appeared in print. A large number of diagrams will illustrate the letter-press. The work is to be brought out in one vol., royal 8vo, 700 pp.

The Oratorio Concerts.—Beethoven's great Mass in D is to be performed at St. James's Hall, on Wednesday evening, as we are informed, without alteration or curtailment. The same composer's Choral Fantasia is also to be given—the two works, thus combined, forming a programme of singular interest. As his enterprise progresses Mr. Barnby seems to acquire more and more confidence.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

Mrs. J. Holman Andrews gave a Soirée musicale on Tuesday evening, in the Beethoven Rooms, to a large and fashionable audience. The programme included Weber's Mass in G, sung by the ladies and gentlemen of Mrs. J. H. Andrews' choral class. The solos were given by Mrs. J. H. Andrews, Miss A. Smyth, Mrs. Hirschfeld (late Miss Anne Jewell), Miss Webb, with Messrs. Bird, Hayes, and the Rev. W. G. Martin, who conducted most efficiently. After the Mass, "God is a Spirit," from Dr. Bennett's Woman of Samaria was given, with Henry Smart's charming part song, "Ave Marie," and Coward's "Take thy Banner," which closed the first part. The second part consisted of a miscellaneous selection, commencing with "The Spring Song" Signor Ciabatta's excellent rendering of Paladilhe's "Mandolinata" obtained an encore, and the same compliment was given to the artistic singing of Miss H. Edith and Gertrude E. Andrews in Stern's duet, "The Woodlands;" the latter also sang with much taste a song from Weber's Oberon. Mrs. Hirschfeld was encored in a song by Mrs. J. H. Andrews, called "The Rainbow." Mrs. E. S. Pratten played solos on the guitar, and Mr. J. M. Wehli, his own arrangement for the pianoforte, on airs from Rigoletto. Mrs. J. H. Andrews and Miss A. M. F. Andrews, with G. S. Minson, accompanied.

The first concert of the fourth season of the Schubert Society took place on Thursday, 24th February, the first part of the programme formed by compositions of Franz Schubert. His celebrated string quartet in A minor ("Hungarian") opened the evening, capitally played by Herren Ludwig, Jung, Eberwein, and Schuberth; the programme included, also, a song, "As o'er the Alps he ranges," sung by Mr. Renwick; "Adieu," Miss Mayfield; "Weary Flowers," Mr. Stedman; and a violoncello solo, the inimitable "Ave Maria," played with much feeling by Herr Schuberth. The second part was miscellaneous, including a sonata for piano and violin, Mozart, Herr Schrattenholz and Herr Ludwig; solo, pianoforte, Concerstück (Weber), Herr Schrattenholz. Miss Barry Eldon made her first appearance, since her return from the Continent, and earned hearty applause for Bishop's "Bid me discourse;" she was joined by Miss Mayfield in a duet from Mr. Macfarren's She Stoops to Conquer. The latter lady sang also Bandegger's charming song, "Peacefully slumber" violoncello obbligato, Herr Schuberth); and was joined by Mr. Stedman in Nicolai's duet, "One word." Mr. Renwick gave Hatton's "Wreck of the Hesperus." The rooms were crowded, and the concert was a success. The next will be devoted to some of Schumann's instrumental and vocal compositions.

Madame Laura Baxter, the well-known contralto, gave a musical entertainment at Drury Lane Theatre, on Ash Wednesday, to a fair audience. The feature of the programme was Rossini's Stabat Mater, in which the solos were assigned to Madame Rudersdorff, Madame Baxter, Mr. R. Larwill, and Herr Stepan. The chorus and band, under the direction of Mr. C. J. Hargitt (Mr. J. T. Willy, leader), a selection from Mr. J. Barnett's Raymond Mortimer, in which Madame Rudersdorff, Madame Baxter, Mr. Renwick, and Mr. Byron, took part (Madame Baxter being encored in "Sleep, it is a gentle thing," and Mr. Byron in "The Harbour Bay"), closed the first part. The second consisted of an alla podrida, vocal and instrumental, too long by far for detailed description. Amongst the things most worthy of notice was the part singing of the St. Cecilia Choral Society (under Mr. Hargitt), a brilliant duet for two pianofortes (Mendelssohn and Moscheles) on the March from Preciosa, by Miss Emma Barnett and Mr. Lindsay Sloper, and the singing of Madame Laura Baxter, in Meyerbeer's "Nobil Signor," accompanied by the band. Messrs. L. Sloper, Ganz, F. Mori, and Zerbini were among the various conductors and accompanists.

The Students of the Royal Academy of Music gave a concert, on Thursday evening. The following was the programme, executed in all cases with earnest care, and in some with more than average ability:—

"Allegro Maestoso" and "Large Pastorale," from Grand Duet in A, for two pianofortes, Moscheles (Miss Bairnsfather and Miss Jessie Ferrari); Glee, "Swiftly from the mountain's brow," Webbe (Miss Pocklington, Miss E. Gardner, Mr. Shakespeare, and Mr. Parry); Aria, "Dalla sua pace," Mozart (Mr. Shakespeare); Six Variations, on Air in F, Op. 34, Pianoforte, Beethoven (Miss Field); Chamber Duet, "Langue geme," Handel (Miss Goode and Miss Marion Severn); Andante, in C, Flute, Mozart (Mr. Cook); Aria, "Cangio d'aspetto" (Adriasto), Handel (Miss Marion Severn); Sonata, in F, Pianoforte, Mozart (Miss L. Gardner); Romanza, "La dea del Lago," Donizetti (Miss Rebecca Jewell); Capriccio, in E minor, Pianoforte, Mendelssohn, and Arabesque, Pianoforte, Schumann (Miss Taylor); Songs: "To Chloe in Sickness" and "May Dew," W. S. Bennett (Miss Ferrari); Valse, in A flat, Op. 42, Pianoforte, Chopin (Miss Channell); Song, "Zuleika," Mendelssohn (Miss Pocklington); Madrigal, "All creatures now are merry minded," Benet (by all the Students). Among the vocalists, Miss Marion Severn, Miss Rebecca Jewell, and Miss Ferrari, made the "hits" of the evening. Miss Severn in Handel's "Cangio d'aspetto," Miss Jewell in a Romanza by Donizetti, and Miss Ferrari in Professor Bennett's "May Dew," all three skilfully accompanied by Miss Jessie Ferrari. Miss Townsend, Mr. Heywood, and Mr. Wingham accompanied the other vocal pieces. Miss L. Gardner deserves a word of praise for her performance of a sonata, by Mozart, and Miss Taylor another for that of Mendelssohn's Capriccio, in E minor.

North-West Amateur Musical Society.—A vocal and instrumental concert was given by this society, at the Eyre Arms, on Thursday evening, Feb. 24, under the direction of Mr. W. Bovan. The singers were Mdme. Florence Lancia, Misses S. Poynts, J. Boyd, Sinclair, and Knott, Messrs. Nottingham and Bovan, the latter of the second tenor. The instrumentalists were Miss Kate Roberts, Messrs. Lazarus, T. H. Wright, Buziau, W. Beavan, Mori, J. Beavan, and Bartle. It would be invidious to select any artists in particular for commendation, inasmuch as everything was applauded, and almost encores "re-called." The choir evinced good training in Mendelssohn's "Hear my prayer," the execution of which reflected credit alike on the members and on their conductor, Mr. W. Beavan. Miss Poynts gave the solo part admirably. The concert was attended by a large and appreciative audience.

MR. JOHN BOOSEY'S ASH WEDNESDAY.

Ash Wednesday was celebrated at St. James's Hall by a "Grand Concert of Sacred and Ballad Music," organised by Mr. John Boosey, the success of whose Ballad Concerts is notorious. The first part of the programme was devoted to music either directly or indirectly of a sacred character. It commenced with Becker's part song, "The Little Church," by the Orphens Glee Union. This was followed by "O rest in the Lord," sung by Miss Julia Elton; Madame Sainton's "If thou wouldst reap," by Miss Edith Wynne; "In native worth," by Mr. Vernon Rigby; and Monsieur Lemmens' "Legend of the Crossbill," by Madame Lemmens. It is needless to say how well these pieces were sung. The first part ended with a selection from Mr. Sullivan's Prodigal Son, beginning with "Trust in the Lord," sung with much earnestness by Mr. Maybrick; "Love not the world," by Madame Patey; "Come ye Children," by Mr. Vernon Rigby, and "O that thou hadst hearkened," by Miss Wynne, were all excellently rendered, and the last encored.

The characteristic scena, "I will arise," was given by the incomparable singer for whom the tenor music of the oratorio was expressly written, and whose admirable delivery of this and other pieces produced so profound an impression on the production of the work at last year's Worcester Musical Festival. Not then, or at any previous period in his career, has Mr. Sims Reeves sung more grandly. In elevation of style, intense and genuine pathos, admirable phrasing, and general refinement, his performance was one of those rare examples of intellectual conception and highly-finished vocal art, for which no amount of praise can be in excess; and so the audience seemed to think, judging from the enthusiastic applause bestowed on the singer, whose first entry, indeed, was greeted with a warmth which proved that the disappointment sometimes manifested when he is too unwell to sing, is really no great because of the estimation in which he is held. The quartet, "The Lord is nigh," by the four singers first named, terminated the selection from Mr. Sullivan's work, which was accompanied as the pianoforte by the composer.

The second part was altogether miscellaneous, including, "Come into the garden, Maud," and "Tom Bowling," by Mr. Reeves, who was again received with acclamations, and had to repeat the first. Other songs, by various singers, madrigals by the glee party, and a pianoforte fantasia brilliantly played by Miss Kate Roberts, made up the remainder of the concert, which attracted a full room. Mr. J. L. Hatton conducted.

A VISIT TO BEETHOVEN'S TOMB.*

A short time after my arrival at Vienna, in 1835, I engaged as music-master a member of the Burgtheater. He was by no means a virtuoso, but he knew enough for my purpose, and, as he spoke French pretty well, I was always pleased to see him. One day, the conversation turned upon Beethoven. "I have often seen him," said my master. "He was decidedly the most eccentric man you could find on the face of the globe. I should never end were I to tell you all the strange things attributed to him during his lifetime. He was as capricious as a woman. One evening, at a party given by Prince Lichnowaky, who had invited him solely on account of his talent, for, as a rule, it was impossible to get a word out of him, he persisted in refusing to play anything. Some of the ladies went so far as to go down upon their knees, and yet were unable to prevail on him to approach the piano. He appeared to be continually immersed in thought; his frequent fits of absence of mind have become proverbial, and Kotzebue has borrowed one or two touches of him for one of his little comedies.

"One day that I was dining at the Swan, an inn where Beethoven, too, usually dined, I saw him enter. He took off his hat and top-coat, and, leaning his head upon one hand, remained buried in thought. The waiter went up and accosted him, but he refused dinner. He got no answer. Thinking he had not been heard, he repeated his question, but again with no effect. After three-quarters of an hour had elapsed, Beethoven, who had remained perfectly motionless, seemed to rouse up suddenly. He called the waiter and asked how much he had to pay. 'Nothing,' said the man, 'you have not had anything.' 'Have not I!' said Beethoven, with an air of great surprise; 'well, never mind.' With these words, he got up, took his hat, and left the place.

"He had some singular caprices. He would remain an entire week without opening a piano; then he would be seized, all of a sudden, with a fury for music, so to speak, and play for whole nights without taking any rest. One day, I behaved very badly to him. It is a long time ago. I was very young, and he, poor fellow, was beginning to suffer the first attacks of the deafness, which rendered his life a torture, and certainly curtailed it. The doctors had recommended him to go and drink the waters at Baden, near Vienna, where, at that time, Beethoven was poor. He hired a room in the house occupied by the mother of my wife. I was then paying my addresses to the latter. As often as my profession would permit, I used to go from Vienna to Baden to see the young lady. There, I found both her and her mother in great distress. Their room was separated from Beethoven's only by a door, which was kept locked. He had played incessantly the two previous nights, and the poor women had not been able to get a moment's rest. 'I will settle that,' I said to them.

"In the evening, Beethoven retired early, but about ten o'clock he got out of bed, and, putting on a large great coat, which served him as a dressing-gown, came and seated himself at the piano, which was placed with its back close to the door. My eye would follow, through the key-hole, all his movements. He opened the piano. His fingers, thin, but agile and strong, began coursing over the key-board, of which each key seemed to be a human voice. Ah, sir, what chords, and how the performer's eyes flashed in the darkness! I remained two hours without daring to move; I no longer breathed; my thoughts were, so to speak, broken off; and the only fact by which I perceived I was still alive was that tears were inundating my face and hands. I at length recollected, however, my promise, and what I had to do in order to carry it out. I hesitated for a long time; but, having gone so far, I felt ashamed to beat a retreat; besides, I was in love; this is a sentiment which you treat rather lightly in your country, but with us, it is serious and powerful, and it is capable of doing anything. It caused me to commit a bad action; yes, an act of impiety, a crime. In the midst of a piece of extempore playing to which the angels might have listened in religious silence, I began playing something in a different key. Beethoven started and instantly left off. I heard him get up, shut the piano, and go to bed. He did this without complaining, without a single impatient word." "Poor Beethoven!" I exclaimed, "How could you act in such a manner? you who are a musician too!"—"Well, sir, as I told you, I was young and in love. What I then did, without understanding all its import, I would not do now for a fortune, and I am poor, as you know.—I can't say whether Beethoven understood my object," he continued, "but his piano was heard no more at night as long as he remained at Baden, where, as you are aware, he did not get cured. A great many years elapsed; he was living obscurely at Vienna; people thought little about the man of genius, who went hard or soft as he got to obtain bread for the morrow. It was vaguely known that there resided in one of the suburbs a great musician, named Ludwig van Beethoven, one of whose symphonies was performed now-and-then, but no person thought of ascending a hurdling hand to him, though he was worn out by age, infirmity, and disappointment. At length something happened and attracted public attention to the rival of Haydn and Mozart. I refer, sir, to the news of his death. Those who had done nothing for him during his life, bestirred themselves, when he no longer needed anything. Meetings were held, and a subscription was opened, to erect a monument to him and defray the expenses of his funeral. They had not than found, in an old piece of furniture belonging to him, the sum of 3000 florins, which the poor fellow had put there and forgotten. Like many others, I received an invitation to make one of those who were to accompany him to his last home. I have kept it as a memento. It ran thus:—

"'The world of music lost the celebrated composer, Ludwig van Beethoven, on the 26th March, 1827, about six o'clock in the evening. He died in consequence of an attack of dropsy, at the age of 57. He received the sacraments of the Church. On the 29th March, at three o'clock in the afternoon, the funeral procession will start from the residence of the deceased, situated in the Red House, No. 200, in the Wachringergasse suburb. Those taking part in it will assemble on the glacis of the Scotch Gate.'

"I went, and must own that the procession was numerous and worthy of Beethoven. The corpse was taken to the Church of the Holy Trinity, and thence to the cemetery of Waehring, a little village half a league from Vienna."—"Do you mind going there with me?" I asked the musician. "What day?"—"When you choose."—"Make it to-morrow then. Be at the Scotch Gate at ten punctually. I will meet you." The next day I proceeded to the place of meeting. My music-master had got there before me, and was quietly smoking his pipe till I came. We walked on together across the glacis.—"Look," he said, "you are now on the spot where the procession was formed. All this vast space of ground was occupied by ten thousand persons. In the presence of the man of genius, when he was no more, all distinctions ceased; nobles and plebeians, rich and poor, advanced indiscriminately, with their heads uncovered, and on foot. One thing especially grand and dignified, and which struck me very much, was the imposing and majestic silence which reigned in the serried ranks of the crowd when the coffin appeared. At that moment the ten thousand persons possessed only one heart. You perceive opposite us, a little to the left, a house touching that old church, which has been turned into a warehouse for military stores; that is where Beethoven lived; that is where he composed his last works. Those are his windows on the third floor. How often he must have cast a glance of reproach upon the city which was allowing him to die without a mark of sympathy! What a sad end for an artist like him to see himself thus deserted at his last moments, and to be reduced to doubt the immortality of his fame as he breathed his last sigh. And now, sir, if you please, we will go and see the place where his ashes rest!"

We went down the Waehringergasse suburb, and, passing the Josephine Academy, reached the Waehring Gate, and, shortly afterwards, the village of the same name. We followed the principal street, which traverses its entire length, and we admired the pretty white houses which are painted every year, on the return of the fine weather. Some hundred paces farther on, we perceived the cemetery. It was situated in charming position, in the midst of the fields, and the delicious view the visitor enjoys from within its precincts, had rendered it fashionable for some years past; every one wanted to be buried there. As I approached, I read the following sentence engraved over the entrance:—"Deine Auferstehung ist die Starke unserer Hoffnung." ("Thy Resurrection is the Strength of our Hope.") We entered the lodge occupied by the porter. He was out, but his wife, who was very busy, informed us that he had gone to invite the doctor and the curate to dinner. "We always ask them twice a year," said the good woman, with truly German naivete. "Quite right," I thought to myself, "the one supplies your husband with his customers, and the other brings you fees." Not wishing to disturb her in her important occupations, we begged her to give us some idea as to where Beethoven's tomb was situated.—"Oh, yes!" she said, "you mean the musician's tomb, don't you? There, go down that path, and keep looking to the left; you can't fail to find it. It is a singular thing," she added, "we have a host of nobles in magnificent tombs, but no one goes to visit them, while every one wants to see Herr van Beethoven's, who, after all, was only a musician." We did as she told us, and soon came near the monument for which we were in search. There was nothing ostentatious about it, but it was noble and appropriate. It is a small pyramid cut off short at the base, with no ornament except a lyre and a butterfly placed in the middle of a circle formed by a serpent with its tail in its mouth. The lyre, is the lyre of Beethoven; the butterfly is the soul, the Psyche of the Ancients; and the serpent is immortality, a graceful emblem of the Greeks, an emblem borrowed by our religion from Paganism. Those who erected the mausoleum, have given proof of their good taste and their sense, for it bears no inscription but the single word:

BEETHOVEN.

It is there, not far from another artist, young Schubert, who was following in his footsteps, and whose graceful ballads were beginning to be generally known—it is there, under a modest tomb in a country cemetery that the greatest musician of our age reposes. A shrub, still young, but full of strength and life—I think it is a medlar—had grown up by chance at the head of the monument, and was beginning to shade it with its thick foliage. The Ancients, whose ideas were always so full of poesy, would not have failed to invest this tree with a sacred character; they would have said that Beethoven's genius had taken refuge under its bark, and become mixed up with its life-giving sap. We, who are men of a positive nature, or represent ourselves as such, merely see in this case a tree like any other. Yet who knows whether the opinion of the Greeks is not worth as much as ours! The mysteries of Nature are secret and veiled; who has ever penetrated them—who will ever probe them?

I respectfully plucked a small branch of Beethoven's medlar; I have had it carefully framed, and for nothing in the world would I exchange this relic of the author of Fidelio.

ALFRED GROS.

WAIFS.

Signor Peruchini, a composer, and ao old friend of Rossini, has just died at Venice, aged eighty-six.

A correspondent of La France Musicale says that Gounod's La Colombe will be produced at the Lyceum after Le Petit Faust.

Madame Patti is expected to arrive in Paris on the 10th or 12th inst. She will make her rentrée at the Italiens on the 15th.

M. François Bazin has received from the King of Prussia the order of the Royal Crown.

Signor Luca Fumagalli has been named Chevalier of the Crown of Italy.

Signor A. Biaggi, of Milan, has just finished a memoir of Rossini, five hundred pages long.

The revival of Robert at the Grand Opéra has been postponed consequent upon the illness of Madame Carvalho.

Mdlle. Schneider is to make her first appearance in Dublin on March 14th.

Mdme. Patti has had her angine at St. Petersburgh; and Mdme. Lucca has had her angine at Berlin. Mdlle. Nilsson sojourns nearer the equator.

The inauguration concert which was to have taken place on Monday night at Dr. Hayne's new music hall, at Eton College, was unavoidably postponed in consequence of the death of one of the Eton boys.

The Scotsman (who ought to know) says that the perfection of Mdlle. Tietjen's Scotch accent and pronuociation is truly marvellous for one not born and brought up to the oorth of the Tweed.

The fête given by M. Offenbach to the artists of the Bouffes-Parisiens and Variétés was a success. Nooe of the guests went home till morning.

No fewer than 937 persons are connected in some capacity or other with the Munich Operahouse. The Chapel Royal supports two maitres and 101 subordinates.

Nine examples of German nobility are engaged at the Berlin Court Theatre, among them a princess (Marie Taglioni), a countess (Ernhardt), two baronesses (Lucca and Mallinger), and two barons (Wilhelm and Kruger).

It is notified that on the first of March will appear the first number of a new daily financial paper, entitled the Financier, and conducted by the gentleman who, after holding the City editorship of the London Daily News for nearly twenty years, has just resigned it.

Mdlle. Nilsson will take a benefit at the Grand Opéra before leaving for London; the proceeds of which she has, beforehand, devoted to the Associations for the relief of musical and dramatic artists. Says Le Ménéstrel: "Christine Nilsson a autant de coeur que de talent." So she has.

The Parisians regret the loss of Mdlle. Reboux, one of the most promising of the Grand Opera troupe. She is engaged by Mr. Gye, and leaves immediately for Londoo. The artists of the Porte Saint-Martin, who make part of the company engaged for a series of performances in London, have received notice to be in readiness for departure.

Mendelssohn's Lauda Sion, and (for the first time in this country), Cherubini's Grand Mass, No. 2, will be performed, at the Catholic Church, St. John's Wood, on Sunday, March 13th and April 17th (Easter Sunday), with a full orchestra and chorus, under the direction of Mr. Charles J. Hargitt.

A musical contemporary made two curious mistakes in his last number. First, he spoke of Prince Poniatowski as a royal person; and, next, announced that M. Auber had received "The Grand Cross, the most honourable of Turkish orders." Our contemporary should know that the "Grand Cross" is not an order at all, but a grade of the Osmanli.

From America we learn of the production ot a new burlesque, entitled Seven, at the Tammany, New York, and of the immediately forthcoming representation of a spectacle, entitled The Twelve Temptations, at the Grand Operahouse, and a version of Frou-Frou, at the Fifth Avenue. Mrs. Howard Paul has obtained a great success at the French Theatre in the Grand Duchess.

To the present dearth of good singers, and especially of good tenors, the news from Italy about Signor Perotti, whose performances at Turin, Rome, and Florence (now, during the "Carnival") are unanimously extolled, will be received with general satisfaction. What we hear induces us to believe that Messrs. Gye and Mapleson, on the one hand, or Mr. Wood, on the other, would do well to look after Sig. Perotti.

The new theatre in the Strand has finally received the name of "The Vaudeville." It is to be opened at Easter, under the management of Messrs. Montague, Thorne, and James. Engagements have already been made with Messrs. George Honey, W. H. Stevens, and Henry Irving; Miss Ada Cavendish, Miss Amy Fawsitt, Miss Nelly Power, &c.

A short comic opera by Mr. Ferdinand Wallerstein—entitled Quick March—now serves to prepare the minds of the audience at the Queen's for the reception of a graver entertainment affoided by Mr. Tom Taylor's new play. It is of the school which delighted our fathers in the days when a drama, interspersed with a few ballads, and, perhaps, a duet or so, was deemed operatic, and the decline of which is sometimes lamented by living Nestors.

Miss Amy Weddle, of whom report speaks highly, as an interpreter of pianoforte music, belonging to the so-called "romantic school," is to make her appearance at St. James's Hall on St. Patrick's Eve, in a fantasia, by Mr. Willie Pape (the insurrector), entitled "Irish Diamond." "Miss Weddle," writes the Portsmouth Times, "our musical readers may remember, played at the Portland Hall, as a child, and delighted all who heard her."

According to the French newspapars the Viceroy of Egypt has launched out so extravagantly that he is now unable to be munificent in mere luxuries. The directors of the opera at Alexandria, MM. Pisani and Parmeggiani, have resigned on account of the small sum given to them to cover the losses of their leaseeship. It is added that the celebrated impresario, M. Carvalho, has left Paris to offer his services to the Viceroy.

The following will be the programme of the Berlioz Festival, to be given at the Grand Opéra on the 8th inst:—Overture (Egmont), Beethoven; air (La Captive), Berlioz; duet (L'Enfance du Christ), Berlioz; march (Harold en Italie), Berlioz; quintet and septet (Les Troyens), Berlioz; finale (Romeo et Juliet), Berlioz; overture (Le Carnaval Romain), Berlioz; air (Alceste), Gluck; air (La Damnation de Faust), Berlioz; duet (Beatrice et Bénédict), Berlioz; finale (La Vestale), Spontini.

The Paris correspondent of the Daily Telegraph writes as follows:—"I am sure that all musical England and Ireland will be glad to hear that, on account of the great success of the Bohemian Girl, Mr. Balfe received yesterday from the Emperor the decoration of the Legion of Honour. I am happy to say that the last-created chevalier is better; but even yet he does not go out, and he has indeed had a very trying time during this Russian winter.

We read the following in the Sydney Empire, of December 31:—

"Intelligence was received by the mail steamer, 'Geelong,' of the death of Mr. Frank Howson, vocalist, brother of Madame Albertazzi, and father of the Misses Emma and Clelia, and Messrs. Frank A. and J. Jerome Howson, who composed the Howson opera troupe. Deceased, who was fifty-two years of age, came to Australia in 1842, and was for twenty years a member of the musical profession in these colonies, associated with Miss Catherine Hayes, Madame Anna Bishop, and Lady Don, in the performance of operas and operettas. Three years ago he sailed with his family for California. While in San Francisco, he was attacked by illness, and while proceeding to New York, to obtain medical advice, he died at Omaha, Idaho county."

The late Mr. John Dryden ("Glorious John") is said to have addressed the following epigram to the director of the Monday Popular Concerts, before the director of the Monday Popular Concerts was born—which last fact may account for his (Glorious John's) mistaking German for French:—

> "We dare not on your privilege intrench,
> Or ask you why you like them?—they are French.
> Therefore, some go with courtesy exceeding,
> Neither to hear nor see, but show their breeding;
> Each lady striving to, &c.
> To make it seem they understand, &c.
> Their countrymen come in, and nothing pay,
> To teach us English where to clap the play."

The real fact is that the Germans, not the French, are showing us "what's what."

The Paris correspondent of the Daily Telegraph gives us the subjoined brief and graphic narration:—

"We are in full carnival, and entertainments of every kind are competing all classes to turn night into day. A thoroughly original fête was held last night by M. Offenbach, who thus fittingly signalised his return to Paris. He gave a ball and supper to the actors and actresses of Les Bouffes Parisiens, and Les Variétés, where pieces of his are now played. I will not describe what took place within M. Offenbach's rooms; but as the entertainment was in the Grand Hôtel, it is allowable to note the scene in the court-yard of that much-visited establishment. The supper was ordered for one o'clock; when all the orderly people in the hotel were, or ought to have been, in bed. A good many men, however, assembled under the glass roof; for it had been noised that the prettiest actresses in Paris were at M. Offenbach's guests and that the king had ordered his fair subjects to come in fancy dress. Accordingly, as carriage after carriage drove up, out came pair after pair of dainty feet; and tight little figures, all opera-cloak and legs, ran bewildered about the court-yard. Some of the ladies were not unknown to some of the men, and these ill-bred youths amused themselves by misdirecting the innocent damsels, eventually making them run the gauntlet of a double file of active eyes and jesting tongues. The male guests being in ordinary evening dress escaped remark, but the celebrities of the hour—Mdlle. Blanche d'Antigny, Mdlle. Devéria, Mdlle. Schneider e tutte quante—came in for at least as much badinage as the young ladies in their ballet costume. The confusion became worse confounded when wonderful uniforms, and marvellous costumes, returned from the Tuileries ball—and to go to M. Offenbach's. An odd scene—mais que voulez vous? Is it not Carnival time?"

An interesting pamphlet, on the relations existing between French composers and the operahouses subsidized by the State, has just been published at Paris, from the pen of M. Guy de Charnacé. After enlarging on the importance of music as an agent in promoting civilization and national advancement, this great facilities for its cultivation placing it within reach of the masses who are debarred from the enjoyment of the masterpieces of painting and sculpture, M. Charnacé pleads for an increased supply of the latter from the public purse, but, at the same time, urges the necessity for greater care in the expenditure and a more definite searching for results. Thus he would impose upon the directors of the theatres a more serious code of instructions as to the execution and production of new works in order that the public should obtain some idea of the utility of their contributions and of the manner in which their money is spent. The programmes of the Conservatoire Concerts and of the Opéra Comique he would divide equally between music of the past and present. The Théâtre Lyrique he would devote especially to the performance of the works of new composers. The Théâtre Italien he would make a cosmopolitan arena for foreign operas, or for those of French authors specially composed for it. He further recommends the appointment of a committee for the examination of new lyric works, its members to be men unconnected with the theatrical establishments; and he advises the application of 100,000 francs annually to the performance and publication of new works by French composers. The scheme thus placed before the French Parliament at the time when, in voting supplies, these subjects will naturally be considered, is exciting some attention in Paris, and we shall, doubtless, hear of it again ere long. Already M. de Charnacé has been invited by the Minister of Fine Arts to discuss with him the suggestions contained in his pamphlet.—Choir.

We are apt to think that London monopolises the good music heard in England, save when London goes to the country to hold high festival. This idea is far from correct. Some provincial towns are equal to the metropolis as regards activity and the facilities for gratifying an artistic taste. What Mr. Halle has done at Manchester everybody knows, but we wish to illustrate our remarks more particularly by reference to Liverpool. In this great seaport music is chiefly represented by a Philharmonic Society, of which Mr. Benedict is conductor. This society gives twelve concerts in the season of high character, as regards the selections. What music pleases the Liverpudlians, and how much they get, may be seen from the following catalogue of works performed during the last two years:—

"Oratorios, Masses, and Sacred Cantatas.—Handel: Messiah (twice), Judas Maccabæus, and Coronation Anthem (Zadok the Priest). Haydn: Creation and the Seasons (Spring and Autumn). Mendelssohn: Elijah, 95th Psalm, and 'Hear my Prayer.' Beethoven: Mass in C. W. Sterndale Bennett: The Woman of Samaria. Gounod: Messe de Sainte Cecile. Rossini: Messe Solennelle and Stabat (twice). Cantatas and choral works, with orchestral accompaniments.—Mendelssohn: Midsummer Night's Dream; Finale and choruses from Lorelcy. J. F. Barnett: Ancient Mariner. Benedict: Richard Cœur de Lion. Symphonies.—Beethoven: No. 3, Heroica; No. 4, B flat; No. 5, C minor; No. 6, Pastoral; No. 7, A major. Haydn: No. 8, E flat; and No. 10, E flat. Mendelssohn: Reformation (twice), and No. 4, A major (Italian). Mozart: E flat and G minor. Spohr: No. 5, in C Minor. Overtures.—Auber: Exhibition, Fiancée, Gustave, Masaniello, Les Diamants, Leocadie, Le Serment, Zanetta. Beethoven: Egmont and Men of Prometheus. Benedict: Prins von Homburg. Boieldieu: La Dame Blanche. Cherubini: Les Abencerrages and Medea. Hérold: Zampa. Lindpaintner: Faust. Mendelssohn: Athalie, Midsummer Night's Dream (twice), and Ruy Blas. Meyerbeer: Camp of Silesia, l'Etoile du Nord, and Struensee. Méhul: Joseph and Chasse du Jeune Henri. Mozart: Cosi fan tutte, Seraglio, and Zauberflote. Nicolai: Merry Wives of Windsor. Onslow: Le Colporteur. Rossini: Italiana in Algeri, Gazza Ladra, Semiramide, and Guillaume Tell. Spohr: Der Berggeist and Last Judgment. Weber: Ruler of Spirits, Euryanthe, and Preciosa. Wagner: Tannhäuser. Concertos and solos with orchestral accompaniments.—Violin: Beethoven's Concerto, Ernst's fantasia, Otello, E. W. Thomas's Barcarolle and Tarantella. Violoncello: Carl Eckert's Concertstuck, B. Romberg's Adagio and Rondo from Concert Suisse. Pianoforte: Mendelssohn's Rondo in B minor (twice), Mozart's Concerto for two pianofortes in E flat; Chopin's Adante Spianato and Polonaise."

For comprehensiveness and quantity this list surpasses any that could be furnished by either of the metropolitan associations. We are glad therefore to direct attention to it. A little of the stimulus imparted by an unfavourable contrast with what was never suspected to have a chance of rivalry may do great good.

NEW MUSIC.

Twilight Fancies. Twelve Pieces for the Pianoforte. Composed by EDMUND T. CHIPP. (Op. 12.) [London: Samson & Co.]

ONLY by courtesy can these compositions be placed under the head of new music, because they were really first published some years ago by another firm. However, they deserve a second notice in virtue of more than common excellence. Mr. Chipp has written throughout with more or less of facility and grace; some of his "Fancies" claim precedence over the rest. We may mention as examples, No. 2, "And up the valley came a swell of music on the wind;" No. 4, descriptive of the gentle whispering of young leaves; and No. 8, "The Chase." In these, and others, the melody and its accompaniment show a fine poetic feeling, and considerable imaginative power. It was perhaps a foregone conclusion that Mr. Chipp would to some extent imitate the Mendelssohn Lieder, but no one could have anticipated his No. 3, which in key, form, and mode of accompaniment, is the counterpart of the Lied in C minor, Book 3, No. 2. The re-embrance here is so great that Mr. Chipp can only escape the Scylla of plagiarism by the Charybdis of ignorance.

What do the Angels dream of, Mother? Semi-sacred Song. Melody of I. CHARLES GOUNOD. [London: Metzler & Co.]

A very simple and, withal, a pleasing melody is this of M. Gounod's. It suits the character of the words admirably, by reason of the tender feeling expressed. The song is in all respects easy, and may count upon public favour.

Heandshaendeo Waltz. For the Pianoforte. By J. F. BOBSCHITZKY. [London: Augener & Co.]

This is an odd production. It purports to be a waltz, while, at the same time, it assumes to illustrate an "argument" which takes an entire page of close print to set forth in words. The introduction, five figures, and finale are so many acts of a drama much too long for discussion here. Let it suffice that the story is very amusing, and not less so the manner in which the music and narrative fit each other. Looking at the waltz as a waltz,—but nobody is ever likely to do such a thing, and why should we?

Appogyiatura versus Acciaccatura Polka. For the Pianoforte. By J. F. BOBSCHITZKY. [London: Augener & Co.]

The object of this polka, which otherwise has no special merit, is to enforce the difference between the graces mentioned in its title. So far it is certain to be useful, especially to young people, who, assuredly, would never forget the lesson.

La Spenioia. Arranged as a Solo for the Harp. By F. GLADSTANES. [London: Gladstanes.]

THIS arrangement of an attractive melody is easy, and in all respects adapted to the capacity of amateurs. There is not too much harp-music of the sort available.

The Wee Pet Mavurka. For the Pianoforte. Composed by LOUISE WHITE. [London: Duncan Davison & Co.]

THERE are mazurkas and mazurkas,—this belongs to the better sort. Excellent as to rhythm, melody, and variety; useful, moreover, from the comparative absence of difficulty, this piece will everywhere be in favour with the lovers of its kind.

HERR RICHARD WAGNER'S WALKÜRE.

In the Rheingold, the Nibelung, Alberich, steals, as we know, the said Rhine gold, entrusted to the custody of the water-nymphs of the Rhine, and

> "Mit arger List
> Schuf sich Alberich
> Aus Rheingold
> Einen Reif.
> Seinem starken Zauber
> Zittern wir stumend;
> Mit ihm zwingt er uns Alle
> Der Nibelungen mächtiges Heer."*

The whole drama turns upon this ring and on the curse launched by Alberich at Wotan, when the latter steals it from him by stratagem. The two giants, Fafner and Fasolt, have built Wotan his Götterburg, or fortress of the gods, Walhalla, and demand, as their recompense, Freia, the Goddess of Youth. She is delivered up to them; but, as the gods, on account of youth leaving them, begin themselves to grow old, Wotan ransoms the lovely goddess with the treasure of the Nibelungen, and, in consequence of the urgent warning of the wise Erda, even gives the ring which is synonymous with the empire of the world, but the real worth of which the giants do not know. The fearful spell, however, caused by the curse attached to the ring is immediately made manifest. When the two giants are dividing the treasure, Fafner kills his colleague Fasolt, because the latter will not include the ring in his share. Thus far did the prelude go. In the first part of the drama we make the acquaintance of Siegmund, who, wearied and worn out, reaches Hunding's hut, and to whom Sieglinde, Hunding's wife, attends. On his return from hunting, Hunding is not greatly edified at finding his visitor, and declares enmity for the morrow against him. In the night, however, Sieglinde visits the unwelcome guest, and betrays to him the secret connected with a magic weapon which has been driven up to the hilt by Wotan himself into the trunk of an ash in the hut, and which no hero in existence has been able to pull out, though Wotan says:—

> "Dem sollte der Stahl geziemen der aus dem Stamm ihn zög."†

Siegmund, with a powerful effort, tears the sword, "Nothung" out of the trunk, and reveals himself to his sister. Both are sprung from the same stock, both are Wälsungen, and a fearful doom drives brother and sister to plunge into a horrible and unnatural love, into glowing passion, which proves the destruction of both. With the words:

> "Brant und Schwester
> Bist du dem Bruder.
> So blühe denn Wälsungen Blut" ‡

the first act is brought to a close. In the second, Fricka, the protectress of marriage, exasperated by the unnatural union, begs her husband, Wotan, to allow Siegmund, who is related to him, and of whom he is very fond, to fall in the encounter with Hunding. Wotan promises compliance. But Brünhilde, his best-cherished Walkyra, resolves, despite Wotan's express prohibition, that she will do battle for Siegmund. She is thwarted, however, at the decisive moment, by Wotan, for the mortal blow aimed at Hunding with the terrible sword, Nothung, glides off from the spear held out by Wotan, and the sword is shivered to pieces. Siegmund falls beneath Hunding's blows. The third act portrays the punishment which the offended God, Wotan, inflicts upon Brünhilde, the Walkyre, who, defying his express order, has not only protected Siegmund, but has, also, saved Sieglinde, who already bears in her womb Siegfried, the fruit of her sinful union, and the real hero of the drama. He drives her out of the Walhalla. She is no longer the free maiden, charged to bear his shield, but the object of his curse:—

> "In festen Schlaf versehliess ich Dich;
> Wer so die Wehrlose weckt, dem wird sie, erwacht sie, zum Weib!"§

It is only at her earnest supplication not to let her become "the booty of the greatest coward" that he consents to surround, with a fiery spell, the hill on which she is to sleep her long sleep:—

> "Flammende Gluth
> Umgluhe den Fels;
> Mit zehrendem Schreck
> Der Feige fliehe
> Brünhilden's Fels:—
> Denn Einer nur freihe die Braut,
> Der freier als ich, der freier als ich, der Gott!"*

This concludes Die Walküre, the first part of the great drama. In the second part, Siegfried, the youthful hero, the offspring of the fearful union between brother and sister, whom it ruined, rescues the Walkyre Brünhilde, who has been sleeping in the midst of the spell of fire, while, in the third part, which is entitled Götterdämmerung, Siegfried, through the instrumentality of Hagen, falls a victim to the curse accompanying the unfortunate ring, by means of which he has won for Günther the Walkyre Brünhilde, who has become mortal.

The overthrow of the Northern Gods, whose fate was bound up with the ring of the Nibelungen, is simultaneous with the ruin of Siegfried. —Die Walküre, like Herr R. Wagner's other opera books, presents immense practical scenic difficulties. The ride of the Walkyres, and the representation of the burning rock, especially, are something which a few years ago any machinist would have said could never be carried out on the stage. The following, for instance, are the directions of the composer himself at the commencement of the third act:—"To the right, the stage is bounded by a pine forest; to the left is the entrance of a rocky cavern, forming a natural hall. Above it towers the rock up to its summit. The prospect at the back is perfectly open; rocks of different heights form the edge of what is supposed to be a precipitous abyss. Detached clouds, as though driven by the storm, scud along over the edge of the rocks. In one of these passing clouds there is suddenly a flash of lightning, and a Walkyre on horseback becomes visible; over her saddle hangs a warrior who has been slain."

ANOTHER PARISIAN REVOLT.

The directors of some of the Paris theatres have risen against the droit des pauvres, and absolutely shut their doors in the obnoxious collector's face. How far they are entitled to sympathy will appear from the following article, printed in the Paris correspondence of the Daily Telegraph last Tuesday week:—

"We have another revolt here. The law is again outraged, authority again defied. The rebellion is the more formidable inasmuch as the insurgent chiefs are men who mix in the best society, wear the most delicate pearl-grey gloves, and sometimes have large balances at their banker's, and occasionally, though rarely, acquire immense fortunes. It is not the ouvriers who now refuse to pay taxes, but the managers of theatres. Only a few weeks ago I drew attention to the serious exactions to which French managers are compelled to submit in the droit des pauvres, the tithes on their receipts seized in behalf of charity. The impresarj seem at last determined to oppose the tax. It has hitherto been customary for some official nominated by the city to attend at every theatre, and take the authorised proportion of the money paid at the doors. Some days ago, however, several directors, without giving previous notice, flatly refused to give up a sou, and since then a conflict has been going on with varying results. At one theatre the manager declined to acknowledge the commissaire unless he wore his scarf of office; but when he had complied with this formality he found only 60 francs of money paid for seats taken in advance and 100 francs which belonged to the woman who presides at the bureau. At the Variétés 500 francs were paid, but the account-books were not shown. At the Vaudeville the receivers took the cash-box, out of which they helped themselves to their tithes of 500 francs. At the Gaieté, Cirque, and Palais Royal, every farthing was refused. At the Ambigu the officials found only 10 francs of receipts; but they took possession of the change belonging to the woman clerk. The manager of one theatre was so enraged that, in order to lessen the tax, he is said to have let in for nothing the people who in the evening were unprovided with tickets—a new and ingenious method of cutting off his nose to spite his face. All this seems very childish, as illogical and unreasonable as the Quaker's old habit of letting his clock be seized every half-year and buying it back again by way of protest against the iniquity of church-rates. But it will have the effect of bringing public opinion to bear upon the

---

* "By deep cunning Alberich obtained a yellow ring out of the Rhine gold. We tremble in amazement at its great magic power; with it, he overcomes all of us in the mighty host of the Nibelungen."

† "The steel would become him who pulled it out of the trunk."

‡ "Bride and sister art thou to thy brother. So, then, let Wälsungen blood bloom on."

§ "I plunge you into a deep sleep. If anyone rouses you, in your defenceless state, his wife shall you be, when you awake."

* "Let glowing flame, terrible and all-consuming, surround the rock. Let the coward flee Brünhilde's rock; for let only one woo (free) the bride, namely, one who is freer than I, who am a god." The word "freien" means "to free, deliver," as well as "to woo."

question, and it may provoke a discussion in the Chamber. The directors appear to persuade themselves that the tax is not legal because it has not, they maintain, been decreed by the Legislature—a bold doctrine for so young a constitutional Government as that of the France of to-day. As a matter of fact, the law dates from the time of the first Republic, it having been decreed on the 7th of Frimaire in the year 5—in other words, on the 27th of November, 1796—that the spectators at theatres, balls, concerts, races, &c., should pay an additional décime on every franc in the prices of admission for the good of the poor. This has been re-enacted in the budget of every succeeding year, and I do not see that the managers have any legal locus standi in their refusal to conform to the requirements of the law. They accepted management subject to a certain drawback, and they should not now complain of being hardly used. You will observe that neither of the five subventionized theatres has actively protested. They have entered, it is maintained, into a bargain with the State, and they cannot repudiate their share of the liability. There was more excuse for the continuance of the exaction in the old times, when each theatre had, to some extent, a property in a particular class of dramatic performances. But now that anything may be played at any theatre the managers have no monopolistic quid for their charitable quo. The question of legal right came before the Tribunal of Commerce yesterday, and it was arranged by the Court that things should remain in statu quo until Wednesday, when a definitive judgment should be pronounced. Meanwhile the directors are not to pay the poor-rate, on condition that they give an account of their receipts for each evening. Will not this ad interim decision seem strange to English lawyers? So long as the tax is allowed by law it surely ought to be levied, and a practice of eighty years' standing ought not to be set aside even for a day without grave and overwhelming importance.

The entire tendency of modern legislation is to do away with taxes which press on any one particular class of the community. There is no more reason why a manager should give away a tenth of his receipts in charity than a newspaper, or an hotel keeper, or a railway company, or an insurance office. The tax, I must repeat, is levied on the receipts, not the profits. So that when a piece has cost a great deal of money to bring out, the house may be crammed every night for weeks, and the gain to the hospitals may be prodigious, while the manager is being ruined. I must confess, however, that if any one class more than another can afford to be specially taxed it must be the managerial community. It is next to impossible to get inside a well-placed theatre at this time of the year without making elaborate preparations in the early morning. The old-fashioned delight of sailing for the entr'acte after a plentiful dinner, and consulting what theatre you shall go to, is no longer procurable. Go to the Bureau, and the sternly-civil woman will probably hiss through her tightly-compressed lips, 'Messieurs, il n'y a plus rien.' Or else a dirty, raffish looking fellow outside will offer you the ticket for a strapontin, 'que je vous laisse pour quinze francs, va!'—its proper price being five. To go to the theatre in comfort it is necessary to pay an high price at one of those agences which seem to be doing a famous trade—why has one never been started in London?—give one's days' notice, like early in the morning, take a portable generator of oxygen to counteract carbonic acid gas, engage a friend to pinch you into constant wakefulness, arm yourself with padding against your neighbour's knees, make your will, and go through sundry other small formalities. Attend carefully to all these instructions, and you are pretty well certain, wherever you go, to enjoy yourself heartily."

TENORS AND BASSES.

The tenor I take to be the happiest man in the world, or, at least, he ought to be. He is the individual whom all the operatic Elvinas love. He loves them, also. He has all the serenades to sing. He alone can indulge in the ut de poitrine. Almost invariably, he is allowed to die for the heroine, when he isn't permitted to marry her, and always has a fiorituras death-song given to him which, like the swan's, is full of sweetest. What little stage business there is, in the way of kneeling at the feet of the inamoratas, kissing of hands, and embracing of languishing Leonoras, belongs exclusively to him. He also can be the melancholy man, and dress himself with tears, and wear the chalky grief and cork-lined wrinkles of woe. The women dote upon the tenor, send him little billets, look at him through the lorgnettes, and adore him in secret, as Heine's pine adored the palm. He finds bouquets upon his mantel, and little perfumed notes upon his dressing-table. If he be a tenor di grazia, lovely woman will sigh for him; if a tenor robusto, lovely woman will die for him, or wish that heaven had made her such a man. The amateur tenor enjoys the same advantages as the operatic tenor, on a small scale. He is privileged to sing all the pretty things, and he may sing them as badly as may be, if he is only interesting. He is the idol before which female bread-and-butterhood bends, both Grecian and otherwise. He is usually fragile, spirituel, and delicate. He sleeps on the underside of a rose-leaf, drinks Angelica-eats caramels, and catches butterflies. He carries his voice in a lace pocket-handkerchief, when in the open air, and does it up in amber when he retires to sleep upon the rose-leaves. He alone is permitted to wear white kids and vest, and reserves array himself after the manner of the festive hotel waiter. He knows the secret of immortal youth, and never grows old. All tuneful lays set to the tinkling of flutes, guitars, and harps belong to him. He alone can sing to the moon and address the stars. In his répertoire are all the interesting brigands, the high-born cavaliers, the romantic lovers, and the melancholy artists.

And he has nice legs, or, if he hasn't, he had better degenerate into a baritone, and have done with it.

A tenor without nice legs is worse off than a soprano who can't sing "With verdure clad." If there be such a rara avis, or an alto who has to do Sicbel and Matteo Oneiri with elephantine ankles, and there never was an alto in the world with whom I wouldn't measure feet, and give them the odds of one or two numbers.

The tenor lives in clover, chin deep, and never gets stung by the bees. Sometimes he forgets to wrap up his voice in the handkerchief when he goes out, or he sleeps in the direct line of a current of air, which comes in under the door, and the result is an indisposition. When he has an indisposition, he goes off hunting ducks at Calumet, instead of dears in the audience, and the manager forgives him and the audience play him. He doesn't die like other singers, but gradually fades away like the rose, and disappears in a little cloud of perfume.

The bass, on the other hand, is the personification of vocal misery, and he knows it. He feels that he is not interesting at all. He knows that the women don't adore him, and he takes a fiendish delight in bellowing at them. He never has an opportunity to languish on the stage, or to go round kneeling and sighing and kissing of hands. He is never a lover. If a brigand, he is a dirty cut-throat. If a cavalier, he is some dilapidated old dinke, with a young and pretty wife, just packing up preparatory to elopement with the tenor, and requesting him not to interfere with her little arrangements. If a sailor, he is a swaggering pirate. If an uncle, he is a miser. If a mayor, he is a simpleton. If a father, he is a fool. The composers never give him but one aria in opera, and that is always written an octave higher than he can sing, or an octave lower than his boot heel. He is always in trouble with the orchestra. He knows he can squelch the first fiddles and reeds, if he chooses, but even with this consolation he is not to be eased, for the man with the trombone is his mortal enemy, and the man with the kettle-drums his skeleton. He feels in his heart of hearts that the one can blow him into ribbons, and the other pound him to a jelly, and what is worse, he knows they are never happy, except when they are engaged in that pulverizing process. What little singing he has to do is devoted to panegyrics upon beer, dissertations upon cookery, and lugubrious screeds upon the infidelity of woman and his own ponderous wretchedness. When he is not confined to this, he is set up for a laughing stock in buffo work. He has no runs and thrills, and sky-rockets with which to dazzle people. He knows that one of his long arias is like a long sermon. He usually has so much voice in his copper-lined and cavernous throat, that it invariably gets the better of him, either running like molasses in cold weather, or coming out by fits and starts, and leaking all round the edges. He must inevitably sing false, and it makes him unhappy. He is not at all delicate, being usually doubly blessed in the chest and stomach, and can't faint if he would if he tries. The blessed indisposition which so often gets into the velvet throat of the tenor, rarely gets into his, consequently his opportunities for duck-hunting at the Calumet are very limited. All of these afflictions make him misanthropical, and he goes through life mouthing his little répertoire of "The Calf of Gold," "Infelice," "O mio Palermo," "The Last Man," and "The Wanderer," a very labmael of wretchedness, and a howling Dervish of despair. He drinks beer, and all sorts of fiery damnations, eats sausage and kraut with impunity, and smokes villainous tobacco in short clay pipes. He despises the razor, and eschews the little weakness of kids and patent leathers. The tenor is the nightingale; he is the crow. The tenor is the beloved of women, but for him no serenade, no face in the latticed shaming the moon with its brightness and beauty. I pray, therefore, all gentlefolk to deal kindly with the bass, and make his rough road as smooth as possible, for it is inevitable as fate that he will live to a hundred years of age, and sing every blessed day of the century, and will finally be gathered to his fathers, singing as he goes.—Letters of Peregrine Pickle.

MILAN.—Prince Poniatowsky has been made an honorary member of the Conservatory.

MADRID.—A new diva, a star of the first magnitude, is said to have made her appearance here. The lady's name is Signora Albani. If she only resembles her great predecessor, Madame Alboni, as nearly in her voice as in her name, the musical public will have good reason for being content. Recollecting, however, the very numerous occasions on which prime donne who were to surprise the world have falsified the favourable prophecies so recklessly promulgated about them, we have some slight misgivings that Signora Albani may turn out a second Madame Albouf, with a difference.

BELLOWS-BOYS.

I have had considerable to do with them in my time, and know pretty well their idiosyncrasies—the chief of which is an inconceivable ingenuity of invention and execution of mischievous pranks and capers, that in due time flower into positive diabolism. Of course, they are always smart: lithe as eels, venturous as monkeys, unconscious of reverence, defiant of decorum, oblivious of rules, aspiring and ambitious after a sort, they are the larvæ of scamps, the embryo of dare-devils, Always boys, they never reach adolescence in that sphere, but emerge, I suspect, from their organ-loft chrysalis into first-class acrobats, gymnasts, and flying-trapeze lions. There is great metempsikose in the race: its instincts ingrain, and usually similar in their out-cropping, possibly a little more pronounced in individuals. They all belong to the Pilsbergitibet family, the portrait of one of whose members Sir Walter Scott has so very well limned. Victor Hugo has not happened to mention it, but it is quite certain Gavroche must at some time have done duty in the organ-loft of Notre Dame or the Madeleine. As a class, they have strong pictorial tendencies, and the white walls of their sanctum bear graphic witness to their skill in caricature and the grotesque—most often, ridiculous portraits of minister, organist, or members of the choir. Nor do they disdain exploits in sculpture and engraving; and when so opulent as to possess a jack-knife, they make their mark upon door-panels and window-sills, and especially delight to adorn the smooth surfaces of the sub-bass pipes with reliefs and intaglios, worthy a Cellini or a Flaxman.

Music, too, after their kind, is an intuitive fine art with them. They know every negro melody and every popular jingle that ever was written, and add to them rich variations of their own. But in a higher realm, too, they are proficient. Their imitative powers are often simply marvellous, but too often are they a little indiscreet in the display of their abilities. An undergraduate of mine had a "Vox humana" stop of his own, that he pulled out at will with telling effect; but unfortunately we did not always agree as to the appropriate passages for his part of the performance, and as I had no register to his larynx, the amateur had to be content till we dissolved the connection. Another was inimitable in an obbligato tremolo that he improvized, quite eclipsing the flutter of the French valve. There was too much organ in him, and we had to part.

They have original and abstruse ideas of mechanics. They scorn the prosaic bellows-lever, moved by manual force, and often operate by striding the fulcrum, and, adroitly shifting their poise, manage inflation in a way not wholly orthodox. Of gregarious tastes, your true bellows-boy has ever a respectful "following," juvenile aspirants for his place, who are delighted to perform his functions in an unskilled, spasmodic way, while the oligarch employs his elegant leisure in carving, pencilling, or practising "pous" on his head.

One specimen I had, the consummate flower of all the vagaries, all the possibilities of his class. Skim-milk eyes, hair ruddiest of the ruddy, face mottled and freckled like a rich turtle-soup, limbs lank and angulus as a gibbet, who could have looked for aught but tamest prose in him? Yet he was the very quintessence of mind-pep and mischief. Alexander of unthought of exploits if the Apostle Paul was ever an organist, such a boy might have been his thorn. He was a spike, a crowbar, in my flesh. Upon one occasion he installed an acolyte at the "pump," while he sought recreation in dizzy heights and a wide prospect. I knew by the jerky pulsation that a neophyte was operating, and my wrath fast gathered head, as gasp after gasp told me at any time my instrumental breath might fail, when happening to glance upwards, I beheld, in close proximity to the ceiling, two protuberant chalky orbs, in a halo of foxy locks, calmly surveying the external world—the appertaining head resting right over the central sixteen-feet C. Oh! how I wished that great pipe had been charged with some fierce explosive, that, at my behest, I might send that head flying into space! That wish was vain. I could only use it as an argus, and, quick as thought, I struck pedal and key of the pipe beneath that conchant ear. It told. One ghastly roll of the milky eye, a meteoric gleam of red hair, and then a thud, deep in the bowels of the organ, told me something had dropped.

For once Pilsbertigibbet lost his sang froid and precarious footing, and fell three fathoms and into disgrace, and never again appeared on that field of his faux pas.

Henceforth, for motive power give me steam, or galvanism, or anything not in the shape of an ordinary bellows-boy.

IBRAHIM.

FLORENCE.—Signor Carlo Dueci, the pianist, has erected a large concert-room, which is to be called the Sala Rossini, and is devoted exclusively to classical music. It was to be opened this month with a grand concert, at which Herr Hans von Bülow promised to perform. The second concert in the room is to be a popular concert, a la Pasdeloup, when Herr and Mdme. Jaell will appear as the soloists.

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

Dr. Bennett's Symphony (G minor).

With reference to last Saturday's performance of this work at the Crystal Palace, the Pall Mall Gazette said:—

"The symphony was that written by Dr. Sterndale Bennett for the Philharmonic Society, and first heard at a concert given in June, 1864. Mr. Manns, as he himself assures us, introduced 'this beautiful work' with great satisfaction; but we certainly do not find in his assurance any explanation of the reason why it has not been played before. That such a symphony 'by the most distinguished living English composer' has lain neglected, while inferior works by Volkmann, Raff, Gade, Reinecke, and others, have had a hearing, may well require explanation. Is it that even the first of English composers ranks in Mr. Manns's opinion after the last of his German brethren? or is it that the Philharmonic Society desires to monopolize the advantages of its own property? Of the two, we prefer to believe the latter, especially while the affect made by Dr. Bennett's beautiful composition is fresh. On the occasion of its performance at a Philharmonic concert last year we discussed the merits of the work, and need not repeat now what was said then. Enough that in all which distinguishes music of the highest class—in graceful melody, skilful development, and rich orchestral colour—this symphony may claim a rank next below those of the great masters. Nay, more: we will venture to say that works by some of the great masters might be found which, in strictness, should yield place to it. As far as concerns the pleasure given to an audience, this declaration is amply sustained. Though elegant and refined, Dr. Bennett's music has a charm for everybody; and when on Saturday the graceful minuetto was encored, not by a few enthusiasts, but by general desire, the fact was made agreeably plain. A better performance of the work has certainly never been heard."

"Antigone."

The following remarks appeared in the Pall Mall Gazette, apropos of Mr. Henry Leslie's last concert:—

"Mendelssohn's music to Antigone is always looked for in the course of Mr. Leslie's season—not often in vain, because the excellent male voices of the choir supply a means for its performance quite unique. In any case, we fancy, somebody would have to give so fine an example of Mendelssohn's genius. The music of this master is invariably characteristic. It cannot escape recognition, no matter under what conditions it appears, because, either from necessity or from choice, Mendelssohn always wrote in the particular style which has become identified with his name, and has exerted no marked an influence over his successors. We are disposed to think the result one of necessity—not, however, of a necessity dictated by powerlessness, but by that serious view of art in which the composer notoriously indulged. Whatever he did was done with a reverence which permitted no affectation. Hence the naturalness of his utterances; hence, also, their obvious resemblance to each other. Under such circumstances, it is curious to note differences which spring from the most subtle developments of art—differences to be felt rather than described—and not even to be felt by everybody. Here palpably the same hand appears in the Walpurgis Night and in Antigone, a dozen points of resemblance go to prove. Yet there is between them dissimilarity as happy in result as refined in character. The music of Antigone, for example, is tinged with a local colouring very different from that of the Walpurgis Night. The one we can see used as an adjunct to the Greek drama not only without pain but with the pleasure arising from a sense of harmony; the other is equally applicable to the scenes and events with which it has to do. As we do wonder as Tydeus and Gaul in some respects, therefore, are works that in others lie close together. Here we have a proof of the true genius which need not to go out of its way after variety, and which can afford to employ the same forms, because able to animate them with a different spirit. For the reason suggested by those remarks—that is to say, because Antigone presents to us a phase of Mendelssohn's genius only seen in it and Œdipus—Mr. Leslie's performances of the work are always welcome."

After expressing unqualified approval of the execution of Beethoven's trio in E flat (Op. 70), by Madame Schumann, Herr Joachim, and Signor Piatti, the Choir (March 8), proceeds to say:—

"But we cannot express the same unqualified satisfaction at the lady's performance of Bach's Prelude in B minor. Unmarked variations of the time, and the liberal use of the open pedal, which characterized her performance, are not, in our opinion, a good exchange for the quietude and conscientious strictness, combined with point, which we have been accustomed to regard as the characteristic method of interpreting the older masters."

Beethoven's Grand Mass.

In a lengthy notice of this work as performed on Wednesday, the Daily News says:—

"In comparing it with Beethoven's one other work of the kind, the Mass in C, Op. 86 (composed in 1807), we have a striking exemplification of that wondrous progression from clear symmetrical beauty and harmonious propertion to the vast sublimity and gigantic Idealism of those aspirations towards the heavenly and the infinite, which were the tendencies of the composer's matured thought and feeling. The Missa Solennis in sacred music, and the Choral Symphony in secular composition, stand apart, both in form and treatment, from all other works, even by their author. They are indeed, not to say it irreverently, revelations through the medium of music of a god-like purity and nobility of thought, fused into a practicable language with a power and felicity of expression that would seem to be beyond human attainment. An author's judgment of his own productions is notoriously not always a just one; but it is impossible not to attach importance to the long period of time and the earnest devotion bestowed on this Mass by Beethoven, and his recorded opinion that it was his 'grosstes und geiungensetes werk.' Admirable, and sometimes even sublime, as is his Mass in C, its clear beauty and refined human sentiment are replaced in the later work by a vast idealism and an awful grandeur that are no more subjects for criticism than is the setting sun in all its greatest splendour. It is to be regretted that some critics, in certain stricture on portions of the Gigantic Mass, did not bear in mind the axiom—

> . . . la parole est toujours reprimée,
> Quand le sujet surmonte le disant.

It is painful to think that it was during the composition of the Missa Solennis that Beethoven suffered some of his greatest privations and annoyances—as gathered from his own journal, and recorded by Schindler. Constant disputes with servants are entered in his diary; besides sundry 'bad days,' four of which (in August, 1820) are explained by his biographer as having been 'when, quite destitute of money, he was obliged to make his dinner of a few biscuits and a glass of beer, as I have heard from his own lips.' The confusion in his household affairs may be judged from the narrow escape from destruction of the score of the first movement of this very Mass—the Kyrie. 'The large sheets, which looked just like waste paper, served in the dull housekeeper the very thing for wrapping up boots, shoes, and kitchen utensils, for which purpose she had torn most of them in half.' Perhaps, however, without such worldly annoyances, Beethoven might not have soared into those aspirations in which he sought a refuge, and of which he has left such glorious permanent transcripts.*

MISS SUSAN GALTON.

This young artist was married on the 17th ult. to Mr. Alfred Kelleher, at the Catholic Cathedral, Philadelphia. A lively writer on religious topics, in the Sunday Mercury, thus records the event:—

"The Duke of Clarence was sentenced to capital punishment. He was permitted to choose the instrumentality of his death. He had a natural aversion to the scaffold. As he could see no romance in hanging, he chose to ebb out his life by drowning in a butt of Malmsey wine. Duke Clarence was a connoisseur in the various vintages of the period. His favourite 'variety' was 'Malmsey'—a wine as little known at the present day as tachryma christi, Falernian, or 'genuine old crusted port.' In a butt of this liquid the executioners immersed him. He suffered capital capital punishment. We narrowly escaped a hideous fate last Thursday morning. The means, however, were somewhat different. We escaped being crushed to death by good-looking women at the Cathedral, on the occasion of the marriage of Mr. Alfred Kelleher to Miss Susan Galton, prima donna of the comic opera troupe. Miss Galton embraced the Catholic faith a few months since. She was baptised in St. Joseph's Church, New Orleans, during her last engagement in that city. She had been under religious instruction about two years previously, or from the time the troupe first came to this city, and opened their memorable and triumphant season at the Seventh Street Opera-house. The church was completely filled, principally by ladies, including numerous dramatic and musical celebrities. At a quarter to 10 o'clock, the bridal party entered. It included Mr. Kelleher, the Bride, Mr. Thomas Whiffin, and Miss Blanche Galton, his wife. The bride wore a handsome pearl-coloured silk, with pannier skirt. Her hair, without any ornament whatever, hung loosely down her back; she wore a hat of the same colour as the dress. Mrs. Whiffin was attired in walking costume. The groom was fashionably attired in black coat and light pants, and blue necktie. As the party entered the church the organ pealed forth the grand Coronation March from Atilla. After being seated awhile in front of the altar, the party advanced to it, and the marriage service was performed by Rev. Father O'Neill, assisted by Rev. Father Morris, of the new Theological Seminary. During the celebration of the Mass, Miss Welsh, the soprano of the choir, sang in admirable style the solos, 'Veni Sancti,' by Barnby; 'Alma Virgo,' by Hummel; and 'Laudate Dominum,' by Vogler. Several amateurs were present and assisted the choir. Mr. Meinhal H. Cox presided at the organ. At the opening of the church he played 'Hark! 'tis the Marriage Bell,' and at the conclusion of the ceremonies. Mendelssohn's 'Wedding March.' The wedding ceremonies being concluded, and the Mass finished, the pair passed down the centre aisle of the church to the carriages waiting at the door. They drove to Petry's, at Broad and Walnut Streets, where the reception took place. The couple then repaired to the bride's residence, Fifteenth Street, below Locust, where the necessary preparations for travel were completed; after which they drove to the New York depot, at Thirty-first and Market Streets, taking passage in the 1·20 train for New York."

PROVINCIAL.

HASTINGS.—A correspondent writes:—

"Two concerts were given here on February 24th, in aid of the Choir Benevolent Fund, which were patronized by a large and fashionable audience. The morning performance included several anthems by English composers, rendered by a choir of twenty select voices from Her Majesty's Chapels Royal, St. James's and Windsor, St. Paul's, Eton, &c. Misses Blanche Reeves and L. Franklin, Messrs. Mason, Dyson, O. Christian, Distin, and Briggs, were the soloists. In the evening a miscellaneous selection of glees, songs, madrigals, &c., was given. Mr. Shoubridge was conductor. Solo pianoforte, Mr. W. H. Thomas."

READING.—Our correspondent informs us that:—

"The Choral Union gave a performance of Mr. W. H. Birch's two operettas, in the Assembly Rooms, on Wednesday, February 23rd. Misses Sykes and F. Danielson, Messrs. Mellor and O. Christian were the principals; the band and chorus of eighty were under the direction of Mr. Birch. The Merry Men of Sherwood Forest is just the thing for choral societies, and Katrine, the Pride of Killarney, abounds in pretty ballads and lively tripping choruses. There was a large audience, and the performance was a great success."

MANCHESTER.—Mr. Horton C. Allison, formerly pupil of Mr. W. H. Holmes, and premier prix of the Leipsic Conservatory of Music, is now established here, and the Manchester Courier thus writes about a recent pianoforte recital given by the young artist:—

"A Manchester audience lately showed its appreciation of this style of entertainment, which is more refined than popular, by attending in large numbers at the Town Hall, King Street, to hear Mr. Allison's performances on the pianoforte. These, of course, always difficult to one artist to retain the attention of his audience unaided, but this Mr. Allison with great skill as a pianist, and considerable judgment in the selection of his programme, was enabled to do. The programme included several pieces of classical and acknowledged beauty. Some well recognized compositions of Mendelssohn, Handel, and Beethoven, were given with great effect, and notably the Prelude and Fugue by Mendelssohn; Presto, by Handel, which is one of the good old school; the Marcia Funebre, by Beethoven; the Fantasia on Lucia di Lammermoor, by Liszt. But the applause of the audience seemed especially reserved for Mr. Allison's own composition—Tarantella, two fugues, Impromptu, and Valse, which showed Mr. Allison to be an accomplished composer as well as a skilful artist. None of these were encored, and the highest tribute was paid to the power and ability of the executant."

CHELTENHAM.—St. David's Day was kept in this town by the annual concert of Welsh music, of which the Examiner speaks as follows:—

"The annual concert has always come to be looked upon as one of the most enjoyable entertainments of the year. The occasion, indeed, was this year made one of peculiar interest, inasmuch as it was chosen for presenting to Mr. Henry Davies, to whose liberality the town is mainly indebted for these celebrations, a very handsome testimonial, which had been subscribed for chiefly among resident natives of the Principality. The testimonial consisted of a fine salver and tea and coffee service of solid silver, value £170. The programme was somewhat long, and was made longer by encores. When we state that it was taken part in by Miss Edith Wynne, over a great favourite at these concerts; by Mrs. Matthison Wynne, by Mr. W. H. Cummings, and by Mr. Lewis Thomas, it need scarcely be said that success did not depend on the musical quality of the audience. Then there were the valuable contributions made by Mr. J. Thomas (harpist), and a young lady with a Welsh name, who sang two or three songs in costume very sweetly indeed. The reception obtained by Miss Wynne was particularly enthusiastic, and on no occasion was she allowed to leave the platform without an encore. It was nearly eleven before the presentation took place. Then the Rev. H. T. Price said he had the pleasure to offer Mr. Henry Davies a slight recognition of kindnesses extended to many of those he was addressing during a long series of years. But before he did so he wished to say that they never felt more proud in these honourings of St. David's Day than they did when their English neighbours and friends shared their welcome, and gave the approval of their voices. For their dear friend and fellow-countryman they did not need the eloquence of the tongue to find expression and grace to the outspoken feelings of their hearts, and so, shortly and simply, he would congratulate Mr. Davies on the testimony it was his (the speaker's) pleasure to present to him in recognition of the generosity and patriotism which had guided him. He had great pleasure in presenting the testimonial and also a book containing the names of the contributors. Mr. Davies, on coming forward to reply, was received with much cheering, and much cheering followed the conclusion of Mr. Davies' acknowledgment. Then the programme was brought to a close, the audience rising en masse to sing the chorus of the stirring song by Mr. Davies, 'St. David's Day.' At a late hour the company dispersed, a select few adjourning however, to the ante-room, where an elegant supper had been prepared for their entertainment.—W. G."

EARL DUDLEY AND THE WORCESTER FESTIVAL.

(From the "Birmingham Daily Post.")

There are some conscientious scruples which it is not easy to understand, and that of Lord Dudley, in reference to the performance of sacred music in sacred edifices, is one of them. In this case, perhaps, it is not so much the scruple as the individual professing it, which excites our surprise—for, although his lordship has given substantial evidence ere now of his interest in ecclesiastical architecture, by his munificent contributions to the Restoration Fund of Worcester Cathedral, his reputation as a musical patron and connoisseur is indentified more with the music of opera and ballet than with that of the Church. Stranger than either the scruple or the quarter whence it comes, however, is the manner in which it has recently been pressed. We can quite understand and respect a sincere, even though mistaken opposition to the performance of Festival music in a Cathedral, as a supposed desecration or, at least, diversion of the building from its appointed purpose; but we must confess that it is quite beyond us to appreciate the casuistry which can lead a super-sensitive conscience to take advantage of the need of the Church itself, to constrain its activity, and seek to buy its acquiescence by means of a golden bribe. Yet this is substantially what the Earl of Dudley has permitted himself to descend to in his latest endeavour to close the doors of Worcester Cathedral against the periodical celebrations of "the Three Choirs." The strangeness of this inability to the Festival is made only the plainer by Lord Dudley's antecedent relations with it. For many years the Worcester music meetings had no warmer supporter than his lordship, whose territorial position and cultivated musical tastes, seemed to point them out as their natural patron and guiding spirit. A couple of Festivals ago, however, Lord Dudley, for some unexplained reason, was suddenly seized with doubts of the propriety of performing Handel, Haydn, and Mozart in a Cathedral, and finding the Dean and Chapter of Worcester slow to share his scruples, he withdrew from the committee and used his influence in opposition to the Festival. Happily this extreme course produced quite the contrary effect to that intended. The Worcester people, who had hitherto been rather lukewarm in supporting the institution, were aroused to renewed efforts in its behalf, and the Festival, which had almost invariably been a failure, commercially speaking, began now, for good and all, to yield a substantial profit. Thus matters have been going on since 1866—the Festival growing in fame and profit year by year, and Lord Dudley like Achilles sulking in his tent, becoming apparently more and more implacable in his opposition to it. Within the last month or two this passive antagonism on the part of his lordship has been exchanged for a piece of active diplomacy, which if not quite unimpeachable on the score of good feeling and taste, is certainly creditable to the noble Earl's ingenuity. Failing to extinguish the Festival by direct hostilities, Lord Dudley now attempts to buy over the authorities of the Cathedral with the offer of a handsome contribution to the Restoration Fund. The edifice, it seems, is still incomplete, and the funds raised, first by the Dean and Chapter, and afterwards by two public appeals to the liberality of the diocese are quite exhausted. In this strait the Restoration Committee, consisting of the Bishop, Dean, and Chapter, together with certain noblemen and gentlemen in the diocese, were recently gladdened by an offer of £10,000 from the Earl of Dudley, towards the cost of completing the building, but their joy was speedily turned to disappointment and indignation when they found the offer saddled with the condition that the Musical Festivals hitherto held in the Cathedral shall be discontinued. The answer so far as the committee are concerned, was of course a direct negative, but the ultimate decision rests with the Dean and Chapter, who have not yet officially spoken. The temptation to these dignitaries is unquestionably a great one, but considering the firmness and independence they have hitherto shown on the Festival question, we have no doubt their answer will be in full accord with that of the Restoration Committee and of public opinion. Already the townspeople are moving in the business, and the resolution passed at the Worcester Town Council on Tuesday can hardly fail to have a beneficial influence on the result. We trust that Lord Dudley's new attack upon the Festival may be as successful as his former one, in enlisting public support in favour of the threatened institution.

FOREIGN.

VIENNA.—Die Meistersinger has been successfully produced at the Imperial Theatre. The applause was, however, diluted with a good deal of hissing. We are informed that the performance lasted only four hours, seventeen pages having been mercilessly cut out of the libretto.

CAIRO.—Great activity is displayed by the manager of the Italian Operahouse. In the short period of not quite ten weeks, he has produced nine operas: Il Barbiere, L'Elisire, La Traviata, Rigoletto, Ernani, Il Trovatore, Un Ballo in Maschera, Lucia, and Faust, together with two ballets: Gisela, and La Fille mal-gardée.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

MESSRS. GYE AND MAPLESON issued their prospectus for the coming season on Thursday. It is a business-like document, altogether free from trumpet flourishes, and comes at once to the point. Let us imitate so good an example.

As to engagements, four absolute first appearances are announced. The singers in question are Mdlle. Olma, Mdlle. Cari (Miss Carey, an American contralto), Mdlle. Madigan, and Mdlle. Sessi. Respecting the first and third we know nothing; the second is well reported of; the fourth, as our readers know, enjoys a Parisian reputation. Apart from Mdlle. Sessi, who may or may not be equal to her fame, the directors will have to depend upon the prime donne of former seasons, the chiefs of whom—Mdme. Adelina Patti and Mdme. Pauline Lucca—are announced. Mdlle. Tietjens, moreover, will assist the management with her long experience and indomitable energy. The other ladies promised are Mdlles. Vanzini, Locatelli, Scalchi, Bauermeister, and Dell'Ance. These are all well known, and the extent of their attraction can be estimated. We come, now, to the gentlemen, who are, without exception, more or less familiar to London opera-goers. The tenors include MM. Wachtel, Della Rocca, Naudin, Gunz, Marino, and Mario; the baritones and basses are MM. Cotogni, Bagagiolo, Petit, Capponi, Fallar, Tagliafico, Ciampi, Caravoglia, Rossi, and Graziani. The directors have thought a simple mention of these names sufficient, and there is no doubt they are quite right. Last year's system of duality is kept up with regard to conducting, and Signor Vianesi will alternate with Signor Bevignani, who comes to his post fresh from a course of training in the provinces. We infer, of necessity, that duality in conducting has been found to have advantages. Signor Tito Mattei assumes the post of Maestro al Piano, and Mr. Augustus Harris, as heretofore, takes the place of stage-manager.

In the department of works promised we look, first of all, for novelties, and find two—Signor Campana's Esmeralda, and Verdi's Macbeth. The latter will be interesting, when it comes; of the former we know no more than that it has had success at St. Petersburg. But whatever its merit, we shall, at least, witness Mdme. Patti's assumption of a new part. Among the known operas which are cast are some we feel bound to welcome. Medea, Fidelio, Il Flauto Magico, Guglielmo Tell, Der Freischütz, Don Giovanni, and Le Nozze di Figaro, give a classical tinge to the prospectus which will gratify a large section of music lovers. Among works less exalted we notice Le Domino Noir (Mdme. Lucca as Angela), I Puritani (Mdme. Patti as Elvira), Lucia (Mdlle. Sessi as Lucia), and La Figlia del Reggimento (Mdlle. Sessi as Maria). If we refrain from naming others it is because there is nothing in the arrangements concerning them to call for particular notice.

Thus, then, we know what Messrs. Gye and Mapleson mean to do. Comments are unnecessary, and comparison is impossible, because Mr. Wood has not yet shown his hand. The next move rests with Drury Lane.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

The musical critic of the Daily News has just illustrated the danger attending a rash use of terms. He is among those who admire Robert Schumann's music, and, very properly, he loses no chance of furthering its success. Thus far, the critic does no more than the duty which every honest man feels to be binding. But our friend has no right to impute motives where he discovers opinions different from his own. In a recent notice of Schumann's pianoforte concerto he spoke of those who are "pledged" to decry it and all other things by the same composer. If the Daily News critic knows anything of English he must be aware that the term we have quoted, when used in reference to those in a position similar to his own, is a very ugly one. A "pledge" implies a binding engagement. Will the Daily News critic inform us, at his earliest convenience, with whom those who do not admire Schumann have entered into such a contract? If not, he must admit that the word was used with a want of caution such as a public writer ought carefully to guard against.

In another column we give a report of the meeting held at Worcester last Saturday, with reference to Lord Dudley's attempt upon the Three Choir Festivals. Our readers will be glad that local public opinion is thoroughly roused upon the question, and that an ancient and praiseworthy institution is not doomed to be smothered by bribed guardians without a struggle. The decision of the Dean and Chapter will be anticipated with great interest; but, meanwhile, everything should be done to influence it in the right direction. In our opinion little can be gained by arguing the legality of performances in a church. Discussion about this has gone on for years with no result, because the matter is one with which men's prejudices are mixed up. The friends of the Festival should, therefore, abandon this ground, and urge upon the Dean and Chapter the inevitable consequence of accepting Lord Dudley's offer. In what a very undesirable position those reverend men will stand, should they yield to temptation, we need not say. Either the Festivals, as now conducted, are right or wrong. If right, ought they to be bribed away? If wrong, why have the Dean and Chapter waited for a bribe? With this dilemma before them, we leave the capitular body to its deliberations.

Upon one point connected with the very admirable performance of Beethoven's Mass in St. James's Hall, we ask for information; not, however, in a cavilling mood, but to have a doubt cleared away. The full score, published by Breitkopft and Härtel, gives all the "Sanctus" (to the end of "Osanna in excelsis") to the quartet. On Wednesday the quartet was employed only in the first brief division of the movement. Mr. Barnby had, doubtless, good reasons for this change other than the gain in effect—a gain we cheerfully acknowledge.

We understand that the Birmingham contingent of the Festival choir rehearsed the opening choruses of Mr. Benedict's St. Peter, on Monday last, under the composer's personal direction. Report says that the music, so far, is both elaborate and masterly; and that the work will appear as a grand oratorio strikingly dramatic in outline and details. St. Peter will be welcome as coming from a musician of acknowledged great ability, and as, therefore, certain to add another to the treasures of sacred art.

The clever musical critic of the Globe enjoyed an unexpected treat on Wednesday evening. Having lately fulminated against monster pianos, the sight of a "semi-grand" on the platform of St. James's Hall must have gladdened his eyes. Whether it gladdened his ears, also, is more than we can tell; but, for our own part, we trust its appearance was the last, as well as the first, result of the kind arising out of the pitch muddle. The Globe critic must have been influenced by some recent performances, when he preached a crusade against Messrs. Broadwood's splendid instruments. He should have reflected that there are players and players,—some who wrestle with the piano, as Milo did with the bull, till it thunders in wrath; and some, in whose hands it can be gentle as a child not less easily than powerful as a giant.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

The following programme was that of last Monday week:—

Part 1.—Quintet, in C major, for two violins, viola, and two violoncellos—MM. Joachim, L. Ries, Straus, Daubert, and Piatti—Schubert. Air, "A te fra tanti affanni," Mr. Byron—Mozart. Prelude, in B minor, Madame Schumann—Bach. Canon, in A flat major, Madame Schumann—Schumann. Impromptu, in F minor, for pianoforte alone, Madame Schumann—Schubert.

Part 2.—Trio, in E flat, Op. 70, No. 2, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello—Madame Schumann, MM. Joachim, and Piatti—Beethoven. Song, "Good Night," Mr. Byron—Schubert. Concerto, in D minor, for two violins, with accompaniment of double string quartet—MM. Joachim and Sainton, accompanied by MM. L. Ries, Pollitzer, Ludwig, Zerbini, Straus, Zerbini, jun., Daubert, Pratten, and Piatti—J. S. Bach.

Schubert's quintet was new to most of the audience, whose patience it must have tried by the very great length to which it ran. The work, written in the last year of its composer's life, resembles his last symphony in diffuseness, and, also, let us say, in the prodigal beauties with which it abounds. There are beauties everywhere in it, and the more they are met with, the greater must regret be that the splendid genius from whom they emanated was not, also, a master of his craft in the sense of knowing how best to use them. Herr Joachim and his collaborateurs played the quintet remarkably well, and proportionately increased the effect to be made, in any case, by such music. Beethoven's trio need not detain us. "One of the most original and beautiful pieces in existence" has already been discussed sufficiently. There only remains to enjoy it as Monday's audience did. When the Bach concerto was first played last season we devoted much attention to it. Not to repeat what was said then, we now simply mention that its performance interested everybody. The two solo violins were admirably played, and there was little to desire in the accompaniments. Our readers have already detected the strange combination of names and keys in Madame Schumann's solo. Its effect resembled that of eating ice cream after a hot "joint." From Bach to Schumann, and from the one in B minor to the other in A flat major! What a leap was there! The music, however, was capitally played, with an absence of fuss, a neatness of execution, and a high intelligence not often—as regards the first two qualities—observable in the artist. This time Madame Schumann earned, as well as obtained, boisterous applause. Mr. Byron should have made a better choice of songs. Excellent in themselves, they suited his voice by no means well, and a loss of effect resulted.

At the concert on Saturday afternoon, Mozart's string quintet in D was given (another imperishable masterpiece); Mr Hallé played the last sonata of Beethoven (C minor, Op. 111); Herr Joachim played the well-known barcarolle and scherzo from Spohr's Salon-Duettinen (accompanied on the piano), and, being encored, substituted the prelude from Bach's E major sonata (solo); Mr. Cummings sang the "Garland" of Mendelssohn, and F. David's "O ma maitresse;" and the brilliant septet of Hummel (Mr. Hallé at the piano) wound up the whole. Mr. Benedict was the accompanist.

At the concert of Monday last, a posthumous capriccio for string quartet, written by Mendelssohn, at Leipsic, in 1843, was played for the first time. It is in two movements (key E, minor), the first being a short andante, strongly resembling more than one of the Lieder ohne Worte. This is followed by a masterly fugue, built upon a capital subject, and worked out with exceeding ingenuity. The whole was played in very spirited fashion, and encored. After this novelty absolute came a novelty comparative, in the shape of Bach's Fantasia Cromatica, which Mr. Charles Hallé played with all needful distinctness and precision. Other features of the concert were Master Arthur Lee Jessop's performance of Henry Smart's capital organ fantasia in G minor (which, being encored, the young performer substituted one of Bach's great pedal fugues), Beethoven's trio in C minor (Op 9), and his sonata for piano and violin (Op. 96). The vocalist was Miss Enriques, whose good contralto voice and cultivated style were shown to advantage.

Madame Arabella Goddard, whose appearances at St. James's Hall are becoming more and more rare, is to play at the concert of to-day and that of Monday. Thaddeus Egg.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERT.

There was a very interesting selection at the concert of last Saturday afternoon—so interesting that we subjoin it in extenso:—

Overture, Preciosa	...	...	...	Weber.
Romance, "Unter blühenden Mandelbäumen."				Weber.
Symphony in G minor...	...	...	...	W. Sterndale Bennett.
Aria, "Qui la voce" ...	...	...	...	Bellini.
Pianoforte Concerto ...	...	...	...	R. Schumann.
Romance, "Un pauvre petit Savoyard"			...	Cherubini.
Ballad, "Good night, sweet mother" ...			...	N. Diodonato.
Song, "Thou whom I vowed to love"			...	Schubert.
Overture, "La Circassienne" ...		...	...	Auber.

The feature of the programme was Professor Bennett's orchestral symphony in G minor, composed for the Philharmonic Society, and first produced at their concerts in 1841. This should long ago have found its way to the Crystal Palace. But better late than never. That it was not too late was significantly demonstrated by the applause which greeted the symphony, and the unanimous encore awarded to the minuet and trio. Of the work itself, its origin and history, its design and its merits, we have spoken more than once; and it will now suffice to say that every new hearing of it discloses fresh beauties. With its performance, under the direction of Mr. Manns, scarcely a fault could be found; the orchestra played it con amore, and the conductor, judging by the pains he took, seemed to share the feelings of those who acted under him. We have so seldom the chance of hearing, still more of legitimately applauding, a composition of such importance as a symphony from the pen of an English musician, that when the chance does come it is a rare satisfaction to have to record it. In the programme, Mr. Manns prefaced the analytical description prepared for the Philharmonic Society, by the subjoined note:—

"It is with great satisfaction that I place in the programme of a Crystal Palace Saturday Concert this beautiful work by the most distinguished living English composer. Would that the appearance of a great orchestral work from his pen were not so rare an event."

The complete and genuine success of the symphony must have convinced those in authority at the Crystal Palace that they might with safety have brought it forward earlier.

The next striking incident of Saturday's concert was the performance of Schumann's pianoforte concerto (with orchestral accompaniments) in A, by Madame Schumann, who, while she plays every author with enthusiasm, is never, in our opinion, heard to such advantage as in the music of her late husband, which she has not merely in her head and in her fingers but in her heart. Of the concerto itself we have nothing new to say; nor can we add a word to what we have written again and again about Madame Schumann's execution of it—an execution not more admirable for its vigour and brilliancy than for the deep sympathy it evinces with every phrase and passage. That she was unanimously called back at the end it is almost superfluous to add. How Madame Schumann gave the Andante and Rondo Capriccioso in E major and minor of Mendelssohn (her second piece) need not be told.

The overtures were both welcome. That to Preciosa is one of Weber's most genial inspirations, and s mple as is the workmanship (look, for example, at the theme of the quick movement—a phrase of four bars repeated four times over), it is in its way a masterpiece. That of Auber, if not among his best dramatic preludes, is (like so many other orchestral preludes fom his fertile pen) sparkling from one end to the other.

The vocal music was attractive. Mr. Arthur Byron, who has so good a tenor voice that he ought to make more of it, showed good judgment in selecting such pieces as the expressive romance from Weber's Euryanthe and the character-istic chanson, the prominent trait in which is so conspicuous in Cherubini's undeservedly neglected comic opera, Les deux Journées. But Schubert's song is not within his present means. Madame Florence Lancia, a vocalist of ripe experience, sang "Qui la voce" (I Puritani), remarkably well, and the ballad by "N. Diodonato" with unaffected feeling.

At the concert to-day the symphony is the No. 4 of Beethoven (in B flat); the overtures are Herr Niel Gade's Michael Angelo (first time), and Mendelssohn's Melusine; Madame Norman-Neruda plays; Mdlle. Enequist and Miss Enriques sing.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

THE programme of Mr. Aguilar's last recital of pianoforte music was as follows:—Sonata in C, Aguilar; "Oft in the stilly night," Aguilar; Polacca brillante, Weber; Nocturne in E flat, Impromptu in A flat, Chopin (Miss Mina Bourchier, pupil of Mr. Aguilar); Sonata in C, Beethoven; Lieder ohne Worte, Mendelssohn; Fantasia on two Russian airs, Thalberg (Miss Mina Bourchier); "Esmeralda" (morceau caractéristique), Aguilar; Pen-ée fugitive, Mazurka, Aguilar. Miss Mina Bourchier played exceedingly well, and Mr. Aguilar may be congratulated on so clever a young pupil.

MISS EDWARDS gave an "après midi" at her residence in Ebury Street, when the following music was performed and much appreciated:—

Vocal duet, "La Dove prende," Miss Edwards and Mr. F. Penna; song, "The Diver," and "O Lisbona," Mr. F. Penna; solos, violin, Signora de Bono and Signor de Bono; song, "Sleeping Queen," and "La mia Letizia," Mrs. R. Gordon; duet, "Dis moi un Mot," ("One Word"—Nicolai), Mrs. R. Gordon and Miss Edwards; pianoforte solo, "Alice," (Ascher), Miss Edwards; song, "Connais tu le pays" (Mignon), Miss Edwards; song, "Sweet and low" (Grazia), Miss Edwards.

MR. JOHN BOOSEY'S BALLAD CONCERTS.

The fourth entertainment in St. James's Hall, on Saturday evening, was the most fully attended of the series. Programmes, dedicated wholly or in part to one composer, one school, or one nation, are more attractive than liberally diversified bills of fare; and it may therefore be assumed that the large audience was due to the fact that half the concert was composed of Scottish songs. The Chevalier Antoine de Kontski's pianoforte performances appeared to afford satisfaction. His Souvenir de Don Giovanni served to show the ambidexterous qualities of the Chevalier's style. Later in the concert, another display of his peculiar powers was received with equal if not greater favour. Madame Sherrington resisted the call which followed her rendering of a new song by Mr. Arthur Sullivan, "Village Chimes;" but when urged to repeat "The Portrait," she substituted an Irish song. Miss Edith Wynne threw great pathos into "Auld Robin Gray;" and she, too, was encored in this and in a new song by Madame Sainton-Dolby, "Marjorie's Almanack;" later her talents were shown to advantage in a couple of Mendelssohn's duets, which she sang with Madame Patey. Mr. Vernon Rigby, set down for two songs, practically sang four; and, in short, if every call upon the ability and good nature of the singers had been obeyed, there is no saying at what hour on Sunday morning the concert would have ended. Mr. Theodore Distin, Mr. Carter, and Mr. Chaplin Henry assisted in the part-songs of the Orpheus Glee Union, under Mr. Fielding's direction. Mr. Hatton was conductor.

MR. HENRY LESLIE'S CONCERTS.

The second concert of Mr. Henry Leslie's season took place in St. James's Hall on Thursday, and presented much of excellence, if nothing of novelty. Mr. Leslie is the only concert-giver to whom we can look for a performance of Mendelssohn's music to Antigone, and he is kind enough to be careful that we do not look in vain. How many excellent renderings that music has had at his concerts our readers do not need telling. The number received an addition on Thursday night; and, once more, it was made evident with what masterly skill and vraisemblance the German composer could illustrate Greek drama. The male voices of Mr. Leslie's choir were, as usual, admirable; and, also as usual, encores were awarded to the quartet, "O Eros," and the "Hymn to Bacchus." Mr. Chaplin Henry was an efficient bass-soloist. The reader was Mr. Phillips. The dialogue was much and judiciously abridged. Beethoven's violin concerto followed Antigone, and was played by Herr Joachim in his usual style. What is we need not explain. Enough that the great violinist did justice to his noble subject, and was enthusiastically applauded after each movement, besides obtaining a "recall" at the end. Miss Stephens, a young débutante, sang "With verdure clad" so as to obtain a great and legitimate success. She has a good, pure, soprano voice, she phrases well, and we doubt not that after a little more experience she will attain the expressive power needed to complement these excellencies. Already she is far on the road to excellence. The characteristic Dervish chorus and Turkish march from the Ruins of Athens brought the concert to a close.

HANOVER.—Herr R. Wagner's Meistersinger has been successfully produced.

BONN.—There is a report that the supreme direction of the festival to be given next August in honour of Beethoven will be confided to Herr R. Wagner.

ST. PETERSBURGH.—The opera of Halka, by St. Moniuszko, was produced at the Russian Operahouse for the benefit of Mdlle. Platonoff. It met with a most favourable reception. The composer witnessed the performance, and was called for several times.—At the Italian Operahouse, Mdme. Adelina Patti appeared as Martha, in Flotow's opera of that name, on the occasion of H. Graziani's benefit. On the same evening, there was a Musical Soirée at the Marble Palace of the Grand Princess Constantine. Among the works performed was a Stabat Mater, by Alexis Lwoff.—Herr Ferdinand Hiller has completed his engagement, and left this capital, but not till he had secured the respect and esteem of all who came in contact with him, either in his professional or his private capacity.

THE FESTIVAL OF THE THREE CHOIRS.

In compliance with a requisition to the Mayor of Worcester, a public meeting was held on Saturday afternoon to memorialize the Dean and Chapter of Worcester in reference to the offer by the Earl of Dudley of a sum of 10,000*l.* to complete the restoration of the Cathedral, conditionally on the discontinuance of the use of the Cathedral for the Triennial Musical Festivals. The Mayor presided.

The Right Hon. Sir J. S. Pakington, in moving for a memorial to the Dean and Chapter, praying them to decline Earl Dudley's proposal, said, in the many years that he had addressed public meetings in Worcestershire, he had never felt more deeply sorry than that occasion should have arisen for him to address them that day. He stated that he had received letters from Lord Leigh, Lord Sandys, Earl Coventry, and Lady Emily Foley, who were unable to attend the meeting, but who authorised him to attach their signatures to the proposed memorial to the Dean and Chapter. As to the objection which had been raised to the continuance of the Festivals in the Cathedral some of them were too trivial to require notice. As to the objection that for a certain period before and after the Festival workmen must be employed in the Cathedral to make the necessary preparations, he answered—if it was right to hold the Festivals there at all it could not be wrong to make the preparations for it. But then remained this objection,—that the performance within consecrated walls of these sacred compositions amounted to desecration. He could only say that he could not understand the feeling of those who had held such an objection. He would say that this was the proper place for these songs of prayer and praise to be played and sung, as they were the grandest emanations of human genius. The question of the acceptance of the 10,000*l.* rested with the Dean and Chapter of the Cathedral, to whom its care was entrusted, but for nearly a century and a half successive deans and chapters had sanctioned its use for the Festival, and he saw no reason why they should refuse it now. Public opinion was decidedly in favour of continuing the Festival as before. In 1846 Lord Dudley made a similar offer, which was declined. A memorial to the Chapter, signed by 300 or 400 persons, being presented. He (Sir John) declared as a Christian man that he approved of the continuance of the old plan, and, as a conscientious man, he hoped the custom would never be discontinued. He believed Lord Dudley acted from sincere motives, and had he been present (a voice, "He is in the town") he would have appealed to him directly that this being a question of opinion, and the public declaring overwhelmingly against him, was it for any man—however good his motives might be, or however elevated his position—to endeavour to force his own views of a question of opinion in violation of the opinion entertained by the great bulk of his neighbours around him. Of course if Lord Dudley did not like to attend these Festivals he was perfectly welcome to stay at home. On the last occasion he should be unwilling; but—and he said it with no disrespect to Lord Dudley—the Festival went off perfectly well without him. (Hear, hear.) Lord Dudley was a good neighbour, and a man of justice and good nature, but it really would not do in this country for any man to say that because I think so, I will try and make every one else think the same. He trusted for the sake of the Widows and Orphans' Charity, for the sake of their glorious Festivals, he might almost say for the sake of their own character, that the Dean and Chapter would not part with this Charity for money. Let the matter be settled on its merits, but do not let it be a matter of bargain and sale.

The High Sheriff of the county (Mr. J. R. Hill, a Nonconformist), seconded the motion.

Hyla Holden, Esq., then moved, and Rev. W. Rayson, minor canon of the Cathedral, seconded an amendment, affirming that the use of the Cathedral for other than devotional or strictly ecclesiastical purposes was objectionable.

On being put to the meeting, however, the amendment was lost, and the original motion was carried by an overwhelming majority.

BIRMINGHAM.

The last concert of the Festival Choral Society was in all respects the most noteworthy of the season, inasmuch as it comprised two important works, one an entire and the other a quasi-novelty to the Birmingham public. The first was Mr. Arthur S. Sullivan's Prodigal Son, originally produced, with unanimous approval, at the Worcester Festival in September last, and subsequently received with high favour at the Crystal Palace, and wherever else it has been given. That very great interest should be manifested in the latest and most ambitious work of a composer who had already shown such great promise in his earlier effort (Kenilworth) at Birmingham some six years past, will be readily understood, and the Town Hall was filled, long before the hour of commencement, with an eager and expectant audience. Some surprise was felt that the conductor's bâton was not held by the composer, but possibly the etiquette of the Society does not permit Mr. Stockley (who took the utmost pains to secure a good performance) to resign his office, even temporarily, into the hands of another. The choruses, with one or two exceptions, went remarkably well, although greater delicacy, and more attention to light and shade would, in more than one instance have been desirable. With still greater force will the same remarks apply to the band, whose playing (usually lacking refinement, and at times unsteady) showed a decided need for improvement, more particularly in the accompaniments to the solos, which were invariably too loud. Allowance however must be made for the difficulty of getting together, in a provincial town, a complete orchestra for practice regular and sufficient to ensure a really perfect effect for compositions of such magnitude.

The quartet of principal singers included Madame Rudersdorff, Madame Patey, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Herr Carl Stepan. Despite the very severe indisposition under which the first-named lady was evidently labouring, the soprano music was sung throughout with the skill and intelligence always exhibited by that practised and experienced artist, the impressive air, "O that thou hadst hearkened," particularly calling forth the warm approval of the hearers. Madame Patey (whose progress the last few years clearly indicates that an English successor has been found to take the place so long and honourably filled by Madame Sainton-Dolby) sang the contralto part in a manner that literally left nothing to be desired, the tender admonishing air, "Love not the world," one of the especial gems of the oratorio, naturally coming in for the largest share of applause. In the tenor music, Mr. Vernon Rigby exerted himself creditably, and Herr Stepan displayed a good voice in the bass solos.

Having spoken generally of the performance, which on the whole was as fairly satisfactory as could be expected considering that there had been but one full rehearsal, I have only to add that the impression made by the work on the audience was unmistakable, the conventional restrictions as to applause being utterly disregarded, number after number eliciting the heartiest approval; while at the end of the oratorio came for the composer burst forth from every part of the hall, and when, after considerable delay, Mr. Sullivan appeared, the shouts of "brave," from all quarters were loud and continuous. It is to be hoped that next season the society may be induced to repeat a composition which has made so genuine a success with them.

I spoke of the second work in the programme as a "quasi" novelty. It will be scarcely credited that, in a musical town like Birmingham, whose Festivals alone have given it such a world-wide reputation, that Rossini's Stabat Mater has not been heard for a period of some say 26, some 24 years, but, to split the difference, put it at a quarter of a century! Yet such appears to be the fact. The soloists were the same as before, and with the exception of the bass, who at times seemed all abroad (notably in the fine "quando corpus morietur"), sang their solos honourably throughout. The remarks already made as to band and chorus will equally apply in this case.

Sir Michael Costa being in Birmingham on Festival business, was present at the concert. The principal Festival engagements at present concluded are with Mdlle. Tietjens, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Mr. Santley. Our famous English tenor is announced to play in ballad opera at the Theatre on the 12th, 14th, and 15th of this month, of which more anon.

BUTTON OF BIRMINGHAM.

DRESDEN.—Herr Friedrich Grützmacher has just returned from a successful tour through the South of Germany and Switzerland. The critics of the various towns through which he passed unanimously pronounce him a first-class violoncellist.

MUNICH.—Herr R. Wagner's Walküre is to be produced before the end of the present month. Such is the command of his Bavarian Majesty. The preparations are being carried on most actively day and night. As our readers are aware, Die Walküre forms the first part of the grand musical drama, Der Ring der Nibelungen, of which the Rheingold was the prologue or introduction. Though the practical difficulties in the Walküre are not so great as were those in the Rheingold, they are still sufficient to drive nearly distracted stage-manager and master-carpenters, together with all their numerous subordinates. Most of these difficulties have, however, at present, been overcome, or overcome, or, at any rate, are in a fair way to be so. The greatest was the task of representing—during a long piece of music—nine "Walkyres" on horseback, having on their saddle-bows the corpses of the heroes they have killed, and riding through the clouds to the Walhalla. As the fair vocalists of the Royal Operahouse refused, not unnaturally, to transform themselves into nythic female Mazeppas, so to speak, the youngest and best-looking of the grooms in the Royal stable will act as substitutes for them, much to the disgust of Herr R. Wagner, however, who at first insisted that the ladies themselves should perform the equestrian feat. Another great difficulty for the carpenters was the gradual conflagration spreading round Brunhilde's rock.—Herr R. Wagner will have completed Hollendämmerung, which is the third part of the Nibelungen, by the end of the present year. He will then proceed to write the music of his Buddha, and Parzival, the librettos of which are already finished. He hopes they will be completed in four years, after which he will lay down the pen as a composer, and devote himself entirely to superintending the production of his works. What a treat in store for the opera-goers of the Future.

WAIFS.

"At the Saturday Popular Concert, to-day, Madame Goddard is to play for the first time in public, another work by Wilhelm Friedemann Bach, which has hitherto only existed in manuscript, but which is now published by Duncan Davison & Co., as No 2 of "Revivals." At the concert on Monday night, Madame Goddard is to play Mendelssohn's three "Posthumous Studies," and (with Herr Joachim and Signor Piatti) Sterndale Bennett's "Chamber Trio, in A major."

A son of Madame Sontag's has appeared at a concert in Rome, according to Roman journals, with success.

An opera by Signor Bottesini, entitled Vincigenerra, has been successfully produced at Monaco.

There is no chance of Lohengrin at the Brussels Théâtre de la Monnaie this season. It has, already, driven the scenic artists and machinists to despair.

The following works were played at M. Pasdeloup's concert last Sunday:—Gade's Symphony in B flat; Beethoven's "Pastoral;" and Herr Wagner's Faust overture.

The Salisbury Diocesan Choral Festival will be held by permission of the Dean and Chapter in Salisbury Cathedral on the 1st of June next.—Choir.

Signor Perotti, whose recent success in the principal theatres of Italy has been so marked, will appear at Drury Lane during the approaching season.

Among the engagements made by Mr. Wood for Drury Lane is that of Mdlle. Saverthal, an artists from whom the highest things are expected.

A full choral service took place on Ash Wednesday evening in the Temple Church; it is remarkable as being the first evening service known to have been held in that venerable building.

Le Ménéstrel says that when Herr Wagner has finished his Nibelungen, his career as a composer will also be terminated. Not earlier, O Prophet! not a little earlier?

A new theatre, to accommodate 600 persons, with a winter garden, club, and restaurant attached, is announced to be built, if a capital of £150,000 in £5 shares can be raised. The site selected is that formerly occupied by Saville House, Leicester Square, and the theatre is to be named the Denmark Theatre.

Abbé Liszt has just completed his oratorio, Le Roi Etienne, and will soon direct its performance at Pesth. Some years ago the Hungarians buried St. Stephen's crown lest it should fall into the hands of foreigners. Is there a chance of their doing the same with——but, no; foreigners are not likely to contest possession of the St. Stephen's oratorio.

The art aspects of Munich are apt to take a ridiculous turn, even where Herr Wagner's musical eccentricities play no part. Last year another touch was added to the public decoration of the capital. A gilded bronze statue of Goethe, on the Karlsplatz, after provoking curiosity for days as a veiled prophet under sacking, was uncovered and celebrated with speech-making, electric light, and other jubilations. The ignorant public was puzzled whether the statue were meant for "Apollo" or "Goethe;" whether—the post himself seemed to improbable! This reductio ad absurdum of the national hero is excused on score that the sculptor is paid very little for his work; not an uncommon fact in Germany, where failures are less expensive than with us!

At the re-opening of Womenswould Church, one of the most chaste examples of the English architecture of the thirteenth century, the sermon was preached by the Rev. G. P. Pownall, vicar of Hoxton, and formerly Dean of Perth, Western Australia. After remarking on the contrast which the beautiful edifice presented to the dreary ranges of whitewashed walls, with damp and mouldy corners, which he remembered to have seen in days gone by, when he was a frequent worshipper there,—the preacher noticed the scarcely less remarkable change in the character of the services in the majority of the churches throughout the country:—"You remember the minister and the clerk reciting to each other, the one, we will hope, for the edification of the other, I fear far more frequently for the amusement of the audience. No glad response of any kind. No song of praise. No chanted canticle. The Gloria, the Te Deum, the Jubilate, all alike, a dreary repetition. Two staves of Tate and Brady, to the melancholy accompaniment of the bassoon, were supposed to represent the praises of a people 'singing and making melody in their hearts unto the Lord.' And people were content with such a state of things. They said, 'Let it be, let it be; it is our way; we want no change.' But God, who has given us the Sabbath for a delight, and who desires His people to be joyful in the house of prayer, has not suffered, and could not suffer such a state of things to be. It is His work amongst us, this great change, this grand revival, and to Him be all the praise and all the glory. Moreover, under His guidance, and by the leadings of His ever-present Spirit, we are learning, I trust, from year to year, how to make still more joyous and frequent use of our renewed churches. What happy gatherings within their walls are frequent now, which were never so much as heard of then: the meetings of neighbouring choirs on some bright summer's day—the happy procession to God's House commencing the village school festival—the throng of young and old, rich and poor, to harvest thanksgivings—or the intense delight now felt in the comely decorations of the church at Christmas time, at Easter, or at Whitsuntide. All these are marks of happy progress in the same direction—all are leading onwards. Whither? There is the anxious question which is now so continually asked, and which receives such divers answering. Some bid us be upon our guard. They are for ever raising an alarm. If we restore a church, they cry 'take care;' if we remodel our choir, it is 'take care;' or if you chant a psalm which before was read, again it is 'take care;' and all for fear of the scare of Ritualism. Take care of what? Of the danger of doing what is obviously right? Take care of the risk of manifest improvement? Take care of what the better doing of our best work may lead to? No, indeed; I will not be careful of the consequences. God will take care of all that. What it will lead to is not my concern, nor yours, it is His. And have you such poor faithless hearts as to fear that progress so manifestly guided and overruled for good—progress from worse to better, from confusion to order, and from darkness to light—is the high road back to the follies of long discarded superstition? It cannot be. I verily believe that for us this wonderful work of church restoration throughout our land has a different message, a different meaning altogether."—Choir.

AMERICAN CRITICISM.

The following admirable examples of "gush" come to us from across the Atlantic. The subject is Carlotta Patti:—

"The star of the evening, the beautiful Carlotta, was then led forward by Mr. Colby. The princess of song was greeted by a burst of hearty applause. A cavatina, from Linda di Chamounai, had been chosen as her opening piece. This cavatina in question contained many passages which call for erratic, elaborate, and fantastic salutatory vocalization. Carlotta was equal to the emergency; she soared aloft and tackled the high notes, she docked down and scooped up the low notes. She succeeded admirably in getting her pretty throat full of a mouth chock full of the sweetest notes of all sorts and kinds of tones, and then blew them out through the pearly gates of the aforesaid rosebud mouth so gracefully that everybody was smilingly delighted, wonderingly enraptured. This reporter, as he gazed and listened, felt as though Odd Fellows Hall was crowded with a multitude of bright-plumed, cheery little birds, that kept flying hither and thither, around and about, piping and singing, trilling and warbling, caroling joyously their dainty little bird songs, while they darted every way, dazzling the eyes, entrancing the senses."

"The appearance of Mdlle. Patti, ere before she opened her sweet, rosebud lips, excited the interest and admiration of every one before her. She is slightly above medium height, and more than medium in other proportions; she has a slight limp, which was exercised very generously last night in response to frequent encores. This was acquired by an accident in childhood, and links a bit of sentimental sympathy with universal praise. She was dressed in a rich rose-coloured satin dress, with court train, cut so as to display to advantage her superb shoulders and arms, with point-lace overskirt, looped at the sides with bows to correspond with the dress. Her hair was dressed low on her broad, classic brow, as it appears in her latest portraits, and she wore a small, exquisite set of diamond jewelry. Every lady in the house, as far as heard from, whispered: 'Oh, isn't she lovely?' And true, she is a very queen of grace, and beauty, and song."

"Does anyone require a new Quadrille? We cannot choose between them; one is as good as another—another as good as one."—The Queen.

OFFENBACH'S SIX NEW SONGS, published this day with English words, price 2s. each. Extract from review in The Queen, October 23rd:—

"Mr. Keaney has skilfully and tastefully adapted original words to these truly characteristic songs, so that the lovers of Offenbach may easy any one of them in the first drawing-room in the land, without fear of offence to the most fastidious. We have said the music is characteristic, and that it is without doubt; but it is something more—it is both fresh and genial, and for light, unpretending music, we know of nothing prettier.

"No. 1. LOVE AND POETRY, is a graceful song for a mezzo-soprano in E flat, in a sentimental style.

"No. 2. SOME OTHER DAY, is a gay and sparkling bolero in A flat for soprano, F the highest note.

"No. 3. OUTWARD BOUND, is simple to a degree, but withal charming; melody and accompaniment alike being in good taste.

"No. 4. SEE YONDER BLOOMING ROSE, another song of the sentimental order, is for soprano; highest note G, and very elegant.

"No. 5. GENTLY GLIDES OUR SKIFF, a barcarole in F, the gem of the series, and as original a barcarole as we can call to mind. The song is perhaps best suited for a tenor; it is excellently vocal, and abounds in novel and piquant effects. If M. Offenbach had written nothing but this barcarole, we should still say that he is a very clever and original musician.

"No. 6. CUPID AND HYMEN, though less attractive than the other numbers, is not without merit, and will possibly please many, more than would better music."

And first for the players. Clementi's "Introduction" appeared in the year 1801, and in it he says notes which are marked with strokes or dots must be sharply struck ("pointer ou piquer") the latter less forcibly than the former. In 1820 appeared the Wiener Pianoforte-Schule, by Frederick Starke, a work the appendix to which contains five little pieces, with fingering by Beethoven, which were subsequently published by the composer with six others, under the title "Nouvelles bagatelles," Op. 112 and 119. The book also contained two movements out of the sonata, Op. 28, with some of the fingering marked by Beethoven himself. In this work there are three kinds of staccato ("Stossen oder staccato"). First, the short, sharp staccato, noted by a stroke; in which each note should be held for only the fourth of its real value. Secondly, the half-staccato, designated by a dot, where the note should be held for half its value; and thirdly the dragging staccato (appogiato) denoted by dots under or over a slur, and where each note is held for three-quarters of its value. The same thing, though in different words, is said by Czerny, who had many communications with Beethoven in 1801 on musical subjects. It is not necessary to make any quotation from his Pianoforte School.

So far the players on keyed instruments, with whom the value of dot or stroke is confined to the mere period during which the note is held. The players on stringed instruments for the most part take them to denote a certain way of bowing; and the wind instrument players consider them as intended to denote a method of tonguеing, with less relation to the time of duration of the note. Thus, for instance, in Johann Adam Hiller's Anweisung zum Violinspielen (1793, p. 41), we find:—

"If the accent is to be given quicker, with a more decisive stroke of the bow, it is denoted by a stroke (𝄽) over the note, or by the word staccato. Where the notes are marked with a dot, the expression is different, and it is denoted by the word punto d'arco. Several notes so marked may be taken by a single bow, and brought out sharply by a stroke of the bow. When a slur is found over the dots, it signifies that the notes are to be more united, with a firmer bow, and a slight accent only upon each."

In the same manner, though not in the same words, we find these signs explained in almost all other instruction books, as for instance in the Violin-Schule of Leopold Mozart (1770, p. 39), and in Quantz's Versuch einer Anweisung die Flöte traversiere zu spielen (p. 64 and 193). Some doubt however is thrown on these explanations by the fact that the methods of playing have altered in the last eighty years, and that there was probably never a perfect agreement between the different schools of players. Thus, in the Leipzig Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung for 1804, we find a remark (p. 730) to the effect that the staccato was formerly effected with the side of the bow, while at that time the middle of the bow was used. According to the Vienna tradition, however, Beethoven marked his strokes and dots whether for stringed or wind instruments without reference to the bowing or tonguеing, but simply as showing the amount of duration of the tone; the stroke denoting a sharp and short accent, and the dot a less short one; and this tradition seems to have two considerations in its favour—first, that Beethoven probably never blew a wind instrument in his life, and did not trouble himself about tonguеing; and next that he knew little or nothing about violin playing, and at the performance of his last quartets gave himself very little concern how the players bowed or struck. And this is corroborated by an extract from the great Violin School of Rode, Kreutzer, and Baillot, published by Diabelli, of Vienna, which says that strokes and dots both denote that the note should be played staccato, the strokes requiring a sharper accent than the dots. This is without doubt the manner in which they should be interpreted in Beethoven's music.

Whether such a distinction can be applied to all his works, or whether a time can be fixed at which he began to make ostensible difference between the two, are questions which would require a longer space for their examination than we can afford to give them.

No edition of his works can be depended upon to give them exactly as he would have wished. In the meantime we give some examples of his original marks taken either from the autographs or from the original editions.

X.—A Mistake of Schindler's.

Schindler, in the third edition of his biography (Vol. I., p. 192), speaking of the second movement of the Symphony No. 7, says a word or two on the original designation of this movement as Andante: "In the printed parts the Andante was exchanged for Allegretto, which seems to have led to a universal misunderstanding of the character of the movement. At a later time the composer restored the original tempo."

The statement that the piece was first marked Allegretto in the printed parts is not correct, for in the manuscript parts mentioned in the preceding article, which are older than the printed ones, and were used at the first performance of the Symphony, under Beethoven's direction, on the 8th and 12th December, 1813, we find the single word Allegretto at the head of the second movement. There are in all 24 of these manuscript parts, six of which are "violoncello and basso." One of the parts is dated "Wien, 12 December, 1813." [G.]

PARADISE AND THE PERI AT MANCHESTER.

(From the Correspondent of the "Choir.")

The disciples of Robert Schumann in Manchester, at the last of Mr Hallé's concerts, had the unusual opportunity of hearing a work which occupied the entire programme on the occasion of the performance for the first time in Manchester of Paradise and the Peri. Apart altogether from our estimate of the merits of the work, there can be no doubt that Mr. Hallé is highly to be applauded for producing novelties with the liberality which he has shown this season. We would gladly hail a little more of this spirit, for it is a just reproach against English audiences generally, that they are so fascinated with their favourite authors, as to be careless to extend their knowledge, or to judge fairly of the merits of the writings of other authors. This reservation in music is undoubtedly injurious to our modern writers, as their productions have either no chance of being heard, or, if heard, are passed by without a due consideration of their merits. Of Robert Schumann's works this cannot be said: on the contrary, of late years almost all his important compositions have been performed, and that, too, in a style worthy of the best works of the greatest masters. Indeed, his admirers attempt to place him on a level with Mendelssohn; but, if a comparison of the writings of the two masters must be made, the verdict naturally comes in favour of Mendelssohn. Schumann's symphonies, indeed, exhibit almost endless scholarly devices, but in addition to a great lack of melody, there is a want of freshness of idea, and lack of simplicity of treatment, while too often eccentricities and uncouthness creep up where animation is aimed at; affectation where tenderness and pathos might be looked for. Of his pianoforte music it has been tersely said, that the only fancy it contains is confined to the titles of the pieces.

Of the several cantatas which Schumann has left behind, Paradise and the Peri is, we believe, the only one that has been publicly performed in England. It is the longest, but perhaps not the most pleasing work of the author. Founded upon an episode in Moore's well-known poem, the words have suffered much from translation, and the re-translated English is certainly far from being an improvement upon the original. The music is, for the most part, characterized by all the peculiarities of the composer. Schumann's want of melody is here, as ever, by no means hidden, and wholly unatoned for by the constant changes of the rhythm, unexpected progressions of harmony, and strange cadences which never fail to betray his handiwork. This want of continuity is least felt in the light and pleasing chorus, "Des genies du Nil," (with its not very original subject) in the couplets, "Au bord du lac," in the soothing "Dors noble couple," which concludes the second part; and in the clever and very charming "Chœur des Houris"—"Faites tomber de nouvelles fleurs." This last-mentioned chorus is written in four parts for female voices, the trebles being employed in "Canon" with the same ease and mastery displayed by the author in many of his works; and noticeably in the opening of his cantata, Der Rose Pilgerfahrt. Unlike most of Schumann's cantatas the first part of it is complete in itself, and would always please as a detached morceau. Any attempt, however, to describe the cantata from an inspection of the score, must, of necessity, be imperfect; it is only in the performance that Schumann's devices can be fairly understood. It is impossible, however, to rise from a first hearing of a work like that under notice with anything like satisfaction. There seems to be little or nothing to attract the attention, and the constant exhibition of unusual effect by no means atones for such an absence of melody, and eventually wearies the most attentive listener. There is a lumbering dreariness in points where the composer might naturally be expected to be heroic. The death of the lovers, for instance, is a situation capable of very fine dramatic expression; but Schumann at this point is not only not dramatic, but is positively tiresome and mysterious. The work was performed with all possible care, and the entire absence of enthusiasm from a very large audience can be more easily accounted for by the fact that the music has nothing of the popular element in it than from a lack of interest. This was the last of Mr. Hallé's choral concerts for the season.

THE WORCESTER FESTIVAL.

We are requested to publish the following letter addressed by Sir E. A. H. Lechmere, Bart., to the High Sheriff of the county (T. R. Hill, Esq.):—

"London, Feb. 28, 1870.

"DEAR MR. HIGH SHERIFF.—As I shall be absent from England when the discussion about the music meetings takes place, I venture to trouble you with my views, and to ask you to lay them before the meeting. I am conscious of more than one very serious objection to the musical festivals as at present conducted, and am therefore in favour of the acceptance of Lord Dudley's proposal, and have already expressed myself to that effect at the recent meeting of the Cathedral Restoration Committee. At the same time I should be very sorry that the original object of the triennial music meeting, namely, "the meetings of the three choirs" of Gloucester, Hereford, and Worcester, with a view to aid the Clergy Widows and Orphans' Charity should be discontinued.

"It is possible, indeed very probable, that the sum collected under such circumstances, that is the meetings of the three choirs for a grand choral festival in the Cathedral, without the aid of public singers, would fall short of the amount which has, for some years past, been allotted to the Worcester Clergy Widows and Orphans' Society, but I cannot but think that means might readily be found by which the subscriptions to that charity might be very considerably increased so as to prevent any permanent loss of income. At present, the number of subscribers to the Charity is comparatively limited, and consists mainly of the clergy themselves.

"As the long existence of the present mode of conducting the meetings of the three choirs has been mentioned as a strong plea for its continuance, I would venture to remind you that for many years after their institution these meetings consisted of choral services in the Cathedral on two days with a sermon, and a collection in aid of the Clergy Widows and Orphans' Charity.* Two evening concerts† were subsequently added, at which oratorios were performed until the year 1759, when, at Hereford, the Messiah was performed in the Cathedral on the third morning, the two services remaining as before.‡

"The choral services were continued until 1784, when, at Gloucester one service was dropped, and oratorios were performed in the Cathedral on two mornings.

"This will, I think, prove that for many years the original objects of these festivals as § 'tending to the furtherance of God's glory, in the exaltation of His holy worship, to the improvement of our choirs' was strictly carried out. How far the present mode of conducting the musical Festivals tends to promote these most noble aims, the Dean and Chapter of the Cathedral are the best judges; but it would seem to many that the original idea of solemn acts of choral worship in aid of charity has been lost sight of, and that the part taken in our Festivals by the three choirs themselves is not of the prominent nature, (evidently with a view to their encouragement and improvements) which was originally intended; indeed in the early days of its institution the lay members of the choirs participated in the benefits of the charity.‖

"I will not trouble you further with objections which I share with many others, and which I have no doubt will be fully and ably explained at the meeting, but I would, in conclusion, refer to one which I believe is very seriously felt by the Dean and Chapter themselves, and that is the triennial interruption of the services of the Cathedral, in their usual and proper place, preparatory to the musical Festivals. This need not be the case if the idea of reverting to the original meetings of the three choirs were adopted. When the Cathedral is completely restored, and the nave fitted up with seats and (as it is temporarily at present) used for service, especially on Sundays, the interruptions of the services will be still more marked and objectionable.—I am, dear Mr. High Sheriff, yours very faithfully,

"The High Sheriff. EDMUND A. H. LECHMERE."

In reply to an amendment proposed at the meeting reported by us last week, Sir John Pakington said:—

"When I rose to address you before I really felt I had something to say to you. Now I rise because I am rather requested to do so by my friends near me, who think it desirable I should offer a few words after what has fallen from Mr. Rayson. I do not mean the slightest disrespect either to Mr. Holden or Mr. Rayson when I say that I really have not heard in their addresses anything which I think is likely for a single moment to influence the judgment of this great meeting upon the question at issue. (Applause.) In fact when Mr. Hyla Holden first read his resolution it struck me there was some mistake. I thought he was going to support my views. I have been endeavouring to impress upon you the essentially devotional nature of the performances, and the first words of Mr. Holden's motion are that the Cathedral should only be used for devotional purposes. I have contended that it is used for devotional purposes. (Applause.) I say that this is the best, the truest justification of the Festivals. I am now only repeating in substance what I have already said to you. I have referred to some few of those wonderful compositions to which we have all listened with admiration, and, I believe, with increased feelings of devotion. I might go on for an hour to recite the compositions of Handel, Haydn, Beethoven, and Mendelssohn, those great composers who devoted their genius to the composition of sacred songs, thereby to encourage, by the elevated delight of listening to such glorious music, the devotional and religious feelings of the people. (Applause.) The seconder of the amendment has alluded to parish churches. Do we not constantly assemble in churches for the very purpose of hearing sacred music? In this diocese I have myself attended in parish churches, and there met the Rev. W. Rayson—(applause)—where numbers have been brought together in order to study sacred music. I would allude to the well-known case of one of the largest parish churches in the diocese. I refer to St. Philip's Church at Birmingham. For a long series of years the Birmingham Festivals were held in that church; I have myself attended them there again and again. And why were they removed? Because this church, although it is a great one, could not hold the crowds who came to hear that sacred music. (Applause.) The church was obliged to be given up, and that beautiful hall was built in which the Festivals are now heard. I would appeal to any man who has heard the Messiah in that hall and heard it again in Worcester Cathedral whether the devotional effect was not infinitely greater within the sacred building than it was or ever could be within the hall. Upon the suggestion of my friends, I thought it desirable to say these few words. I could not further detain you without going again over the ground already trod, and I believe it is wholly unnecessary I should do so—because—I conclude these few remarks by saying that with which I commenced—I heard nothing in the addresses of either of those respectable gentlemen which I believe will for a moment influence the judgment of this great meeting."

PROVINCIAL.

EDINBURGH.—The local journals write in eulogistic terms of the Messrs. Mackenzie and Adlington's classical chamber concerts just terminated. The following was the programme at the last:—

Song, "Ave Maria," Miss Stephen—Cherubini; Solo pianoforte, Romanza (Op. 32), Schumann; Polonaise (No. 1, Op. 26), Chopin; Etude, F sharp major, Henselt; Song, "Where the Bee sucks," Miss Stephen—Sullivan; Solo violin, Andante and Finale (from violin concerto), Herr Kuchler—Max Bruch; Song, "The Fishermaiden," Miss Stephen—Meyerbeer; Solo violoncello, Lied ohne Worte (posthumous), Herr Daubert—Mendelssohn; Otetto, in F (Op. 166), for two violins, viola, violoncello, contrabasso, horn, clarionet, and bassoon, Schubert.

The executants in the concerted pieces were Messrs. Mackenzie, Nicoks, Daubert, Wallace, Handley, Tyler, and Haverson. Herr Kuchler was solo violinist; Mr. W. Adlington, pianist; Miss Stephens, vocalist; and Mr. A. C. Mackenzie, accompanist.

"We cannot conclude our notice," writes the Scotsman, "without expressing how deeply the lovers of music are indebted to Messrs. Mackenzie and Adlington for establishing musical performances which, both as to the works selected and the character of the performance, are superior to anything we ever had here before. The public support these concerts have received, though considerable, has been by no means proportionate to their merits: and this may have partly arisen from the absence of anything like fuss or pretension, having kept many in ignorance of their sterling excellence. We trust, however, they have not been financially such a failure as to discourage the spirited promoters from continuing them next year; were this the case, we would be inclined to despair for music in the Scottish capital."

The Evening Courant speaks thus of a performance of Der Freyschütz by the Gye-Mapleson troupe:—

"In the first act, where Rudolph, disappointed in the shooting match, is the central figure, alternately played at by the successful Killian, consoled by Kuno, the father of Agathe, and tempted by Caspar, Signor Della Rocca was fairly equal to the part. His 'Per i boschi' was smoothly sung and well received. Herr Formes' drinking song, 'Quaggiù in questa rai di pene,' received a re demand, and 'Taci taci' was delivered by him with an appreciation of its agitated and sinister character. Although the great basso's high notes are not as they once were, he still retains great sonority in the lower part of his range, and last night he appeared to more advantage than last year, his acting of Caspar being admirable. Mdlle. Liebhart has a pleasant voice, and sang and acted with much vivacity,

The great scena consisting of the prayer, recitative, and vivace con fuoco (the latter forming a prominent portion of the overture), which is so associated with Mdlle. Tietjens, was grandly sung, and loudly applauded. The incantation scene was well put on the stage, and the orchestra did their best to add to the effect. The last act opens with the fine air, 'E so la notte,' beautifully sung by Agatha, followed by Mdlle. Liebhart's best performance, 'Nonna mia sogno.' The acting here was very praiseworthy. The popular bridesmaids' and huntsmen's choruses were successful. The finale brought the performance to a worthy termination. Signor Tagliafico as the Hermit, Casaboni as Killian, and the representatives of Ottocar and Kuno did good service in their respective parts."

We read as thus, in the Scotsman of the 11th inst.:—

"Professor Oakeley played yesterday afternoon on the organ, in the Music Class-room, the following selection, prefaced by remarks on the various pieces:—

"Air, 'Where'er you walk' (Semele), Handel; March from Scipio, Handel; Andante and Menuetto (Symphony in E flat), Mozart; Andantino (stringed Quartett), Spohr; Andante (Organ Fantasia, Op. 5), Merkel; Entr'acte (Rosamunde music, No. 5), Schubert; Ave Maria, Henselt; Prelude and Fugue in G minor, Bach.

"The Professor, in conclusion, stated that, owing to the kindness and munificence of a great benefactor to the University, he had been enabled almost to complete the case for the organ, which it so much needed. The curtain in the centre is merely temporarily placed there, but he hoped that at the next organ performance another curtain of velvet would have taken the place of this one. For this handsome donation, added Mr. Oakeley, I understand that I shall be indebted to the kindness of some of my fair hearers who have honoured organ performances here on various occasions with their bright and welcome presence."

GLASGOW.—Mdlle. Madigan, who is announced to appear at the Royal Italian Opera, sang the music of Ophelia's mad scene recently, and elicited the following remarks from the local critics:—

"Those of our readers who were present at Mdlle. Nilsson's concert in December last will remember the impression she produced in the scene from Hamlet—and we hoped that on this occasion it would have been produced in its integrity—that Ophelia, instead of sinking into the arms of the shepherds, would have floated down the stream with the refrain of her lover's song upon her lips, the chorus of the peasants sung with closed lips, forming but a requiem. This, however, was dispensed with. In the fête with which the scene opens Mdlle. Ricois proved herself a graceful and accomplished danseuse, and was well supported by the corps de ballet; and Mdlle. Madigan, by her expressive singing and action, did all she could to interest her hearers, but with little apparent effect, as a considerable portion of the audience left the theatre before the curtain fell—a mark of discourtesy to the artist which ought not to have been offered.

"After the wonderfully gifted Swedish artist, the original representative of this part, any other singer of course appears to great disadvantage. Mdlle. Madigan, a member of the company whom we have not before seen, is young, and has a very sweet voice; she sings carefully and with a correct intonation, and with ease and flexibility in her upper register, which is particularly good. She sang her part remarkably well, going up without effort to the high D, the orchestra being, however, a little too loud for her. But she made absolutely no attempt to act, which would, indeed, have been impossible in the circumstances, as the whole proper scenery was wanting. The choruses were left out, but we had a ballet; and instead of the proper dénouement of floating down the stream, Ophelia fainted away in the arms of the peasants, and was borne off by them in triumph.

"The concluding performance in the Theatre Royal for this season of the Covent Garden Italian Opera Company has taken place. The opera was the Nozze di Figaro, and the occasion the benefit of Mdlle. Tietjens. The bénéficiaire assumed the part of the Countess, Herr Formes that of Figaro, and Mdlle. Vanzini, that of Cherubino. Signor Tagliafico was announced to play the Count, but being prevented by indisposition from appearing, his place was taken by Signor Garcia. The sparkling music of Mozart's great work was rendered very effectively by these artists, the solos and duets particularly so. Herr Formes acted Figaro with a spirit and vivacity which probably at present cannot be equalled. At the close of the performance Mdlle. Tietjens was called before the curtain and greeted with the plaudits of a most enthusiastic audience."

LEEDS.—The Leeds Mercury informs us that the Madrigal and Motet Society have given the Creation in a creditable manner:—

"Miss Anna Hiles, Mr. Henry Riley, and Mr. C. Lovatt were the vocalists; Mr. Geo. Haddock had the direction of the band; Dr. Spark was at the organ; and Mr. R. S. Burton conducted. Miss Hiles gave 'The marvellous work,' 'With verdure clad,' and 'On mighty pens,' brilliantly. Mr. Riley, 'the new tenor,' possesses a voice of excellent quality, although lacking power. His 'In native worth' called forth an encore. The bass music was given by Mr. Lovatt, from the Manchester Cathedral. As a rule, the choruses went well. 'The Heavens are telling' came with special power, and 'Praise the Lord' was a worthy termination to the performances. Although including only string instruments, the band did its work ably; being assisted throughout by the instrument over which Dr. Spark so worthily presides. Mr. Burton conducted with energy."

BIRMINGHAM.—Our own correspondent from this place writes as follows:—

"Rarely has the Theatre Royal here shown such crowded houses as upon the recent engagement of Mr. Sims Reeves, whose popularity, far from abating, seems to be greater than ever. Nor is this to be wondered at, for the attractions in Mr. Reeves are manifold, and whether in the loftiest works of art, the sublime creations of such master-spirits as Bach, Handel, Beethoven, and Mendelssohn, or the simple and homely ballads of Dibdin and other racy melodists, he is equally at home, and confers grace and instre upon all. The great secret of Mr. Reeves's long and success-ful career is that he is always in earnest in whatever he undertakes, throwing his whole soul into the work before him, and making his audience comprehend the force and meaning of the subject as he himself feels it. Who, for instance, has ever sung the heartrending 'Passion-music' of the Messiah like Mr. Reeves? Who can give such significance to 'Why vexest thou Israel,' with the night soon pass?' from the Lobgesang? Who can warble like Reeves that most exquisite of love songs, 'Adelaide'? Who has ever sung the tenor part in Bach's Passion of St. Matthew like him? Who brings tears to the eye with the manly songs of Dibdin like our illustrious English tenor? And when to all this is added the further charm, that everything is done with the most perfect ease and entire absence of even the faintest appearance of effort, and that while the legitimate resources of art are brought to bear, all seems spontaneous and flowing, the ars celare artem, so difficult of attainment, is throughout manifested in the highest perfection. It is nearly three years since Mr. Reeves last appeared on the stage of this town, and the reception he met with on making his entry, as Henry Bertram in Guy Mannering, showed that the theatre-going public had a vivid remembrance of pleasure past, and no less eager expectation of enjoyment to come. The first notes of the 'Echo' duet (sung behind the scenes) showed that the hero of the evening was in excellent voice; and when the songs belonging to the dramatized version of Sir Walter Scott's interesting novel are apropos of nothing particular, and have not the slightest connection with the play, 'My Pretty Jane,' 'Tom Bowling,' and the 'Pilgrim of Love' were so charmingly sung that their irrelevance was forgotten, the delight of the audience knew no bounds, and the unanimous and persistent applause for the last-named air at length produced the much desired repetition. As Julia Mannering Miss Ada Jackson displayed a voice of agreeable quality, although not powerful, her most successful effort, 'Tell me, my Heart,' showing that she had been well and carefully taught, while her ladylike bearing and unconstrained style of acting created a decidedly favourable impression, which was amply confirmed on her subsequent appearance as the Lilly Dinchum in the Beggars' Opera. If anything could galvanize a passing interest in the deeds, or rather misdeeds of highwaymen, it would be Mr. Reeves's impersonation of Captain Macheath, in which the highest compliment that can be paid to his acting is to say that it is equally as good as his singing; but despite the occasionally really good music there is in it, the piece is altogether of a character unsuited to the present day, and can only be regarded as a musical and dramatic curiosity. That Mr. Reeves was enthusiastically called for at the end was only to be expected; and when he came forward, leading on Miss Jackson to share the honours, the applause was deafening. Yet even this did not appear to satisfy the multitude (some 2,400 persons), who continued their vociferations for a space of twenty-five minutes, and did not desist until the next piece had for some time been played in dumb show. For his benefit and last appearance, Mr. Reeves repeated the Beggars' Opera, followed by the Waterman, in which the well-known songs were given with all their wonted effect, to the unbounded satisfaction of a house again crammed in every part. It will be a long time ere the impression of these farewell performances will be effaced from the minds of the Birmingham musical public.

BUTTON OF BIRMINGHAM.

CAIRO.—Signora Sarolta has abandoned Italian for French opera. She is announced to appear "at the especial desire of the Viceroy," as Mephisto, in M. Herve's Petit Faust.

KÖNIGSBERG.—The stringed quartet-playing of Herren Ahna, spenhan, Richter, and Müller, from Berlin, has given great satisfaction to the lovers of sterling music, in these northern latitudes.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

Two works were conspicuous in the scheme of Saturday's Popular Concert; one, Schubert's quintet for violins, viola, and two violoncellos (Op. 163); the other, a "a dramatic fantasia" for pianoforte, by Wilhelm Friedemann Bach. Schubert's work was lately revived by Mr. Chappell, and met with so much favour as to seenre the honour of Saturday's repetition. Tha result might have been foreseen, although enormous length stood in the way. So far, the quintet is comparable to its author's ninth symphony, which, as everybody knows, makes equal demand upon one's admiration and one's time. No composer less fertile than Schubert in beautiful ideas, and not more endowed with ability to use for the best such as he may have, could write at equal length without material loss. But the quintet proves, what, indeed, the ninth symphony proved long ago, that Schubert is the "Ancient Mariner" of his order. His story may be very long, but there is no getting away from him. Instead of discussing Op. 163 in detail, we will simply mention that it displays both the characteristic beauties and defects of a man who, not free from the latter, abounded in the former. The work was played to perfection by MM. Joachim, Ries, Straus, Daubert, and Piatti.

W. F. Bach's fantasia is one of a series of "Revivals," now publishing, and will therefore come under notice at a future time. We may, however, say at once that in certain respects it equals, in others surpasses the work by the same author which was brought forward not long ago. Each movement shows clearness of design, attractive melody, and pleasant artlessness of treatment; while the dramatic character given by tha use of recitative is alike novel and interesting. As usual, when new things are produced at these concerts, Madame Arabella Goddard was the pianist. Friedemann Bach's music made but little demand upon her great executive power, but it enabled her to show once more with what ability she can read a work, and lay its meaning as well as its design before her audience. The accomplished lady was recalled after retiring from the platform; and richly deserved the honour. Beethoven's favourite sonata for piano and violin in C minor (Op. 36) ended the concert; in its performance Madame Goddard was associated with Herr Joachim, the result being simply perfect. Miss Edmonds sang two songs after a fashion as unpretending as it was charming.

The concert on Monday was one of the most brilliant of the season. Madame Arabella Goddard played Mendelssohn's three magnificent "Posthumous Studies" magnificently, and was encored in the second (in F) and third (in A minor). The "encore" to the third was too emphatic to be disregarded, and the Study was accordingly repeated. Equally remarkable was Madame Goddard's performance of Sterndale Bennett's exquisite "Chamber Trio" in A, with violin and violoncello—Herr Joachim and Signor Piatti. A more perfect execution of a work full of delicacy, and while, at times, just as marked by vigour and brilliancy, has rarely been listened to. The charming Serenade which forms the middle movement, with its piquant accompaniment for violin and violoncello, "pizzicato," was enthusiastically encored and repeated. The success of the Trio in A was so decided that, as we understand, it is to be given again at the Monday Popular Concert, April 4th, on the occasion of Madame Goddard's annual "benefit." The quartets at the concert on Monday last were Beethoven, No. 4, Op. 18 (in C minor), and one by Haydn in G (first time). Both were played by Herr Joachim, Herr Ries, Herr Straus, and Signor Piatti, in perfection. The singer was Mdlle. Carola. Mr. Benedict was the accompanist

KIEL.—The Musical Festival of Lower Saxony is to be held here on the last two days of next July.

MUNICH.—Meyerbeer's Huguenots was revived lately, with new scenery and decorations, and without the cuts and mutilations which so disfigured it in this musical capital of the Future, where the wielders of the pruning-knife respected only the works of Herr it. Wagner. The celebrated garden-scene of the second act, a scene mercilessly cut out by these truculent individuals, has been restored, and is now played in its integrity, greatly to the delight of those still benighted enough to believe that Herr li. Wagner is not the sole—or, even the most illustrious—representative of musical art.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

HERR LOUIS LEE's concert, at Westbourne Hall, last week, notwithstanding some "disappointments," gave satisfaction. Herr Lee, who played Thalberg's Mosè in Egitto, M. de Kontski's Reveil du Lion, and Beethoven's Moonlight Sonata, obtained marked applause. Mr. F. D. Lee was also applauded for his violin solo (De Beriot's "Une Air Varié"). Madame Piezzonka and Miss Emma Vernon were the lady singers. The former gave "Ah! non credea" and "Die Post," the latter the "Lover and the bird." The gentlemen singers were Mr. Charles Stanton, who sang "Maid of Athens" (R. B. Allen), and Mr. Leonard Walker, who gave "The Valiant Knight" and "Mibi Rampoli." Tha two, assisted by Madame Piezzonka, also pleased greatly in Signor Randegger's trio, "I Naviganti" (The Mariners).

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

Handel's Judas Maccabeus was given on Friday week, conducted by Sir Michael Costa. The performance was throughout very impressive, the grand choruses being given with great power. "Mourn, ye afflicted children," "Hear us, O Lord," "Fallen is the foe," and other choral movements were, as usual, among the prominent effects. The solos were distributed among Miss Edith Wynne, Miss Dalmaine, Miss Julia Elton (in lieu of Madame Sainton-Dolby indisposed), Mr. Vernon Rigby, Mr. M. Smith, and Mr. Patey. The first-named lady was success-ful in all her airs, especially in "From mighty kings." Miss Dalmaine won approbation, particularly in "Pious orgies." In "Father of Heaven," "Hail, Judea," "O never bow we down," and "O lovely peace," Miss Elton sang with considerable effect. Mr. Rigby gave "Call forth thy powers," and "Sound an alarm," with such power as to elicit loud applause. Mr. Patey, always careful and efficient, came in for a fair share of approbation, particularly in "Arm, arm, ye brave." The hall was well filled.—Daily News (abridged).

NEW MUSIC.

The Cambrian War Song. Words by E. GILBERTSON. Music by BRINLEY RICHARDS. [London: Duncan Davison & Co.]

A PATRIOTIC appeal to Welshmen by a Welshman—so far this song might have been used by the bards of Cambria in the days of Longshanks. But there is nothing national about the music. Mr. Richards has employed the resources of modern art to enforce his theme; and we are bound to say with excellent effect. The first verse is set to a stirring theme in B minor, which is marked by very bold progressions. Following the sentiment of the words a happy change is then made to the key of E major, and to graceful legato phrases. The third verse brings back the minor key, and displays skill as well as knowledge of effect. Altogether, the song is one of Mr. Richards' most vigorous efforts, and might have been written under the inspiration of one of the men of Harlech.

Reine d'Amour. Romance. Words by F. T. PALGRAVE. Music by [London: Cramer & Co.]

IN this simple and pretty song we fancy tha handiwork of an experienced composer may be recognized. The melody is pleasing, and the accompaniments, while modest in character, are written with correctness and facility. The words which first appeared in tha Cornhill Magazine, are excellent, and the song, as a whole, deserves attention.

Go, Gentle Breeze. Song. Words by the Rev. H. W. PULLEN. Music by EDMUND ROGERS. [London: Duncan Davison & Co.]

A BALLAD which makes very high demands upon singer and accompanist. It is so written as to suit all voices more or less; but contraltos, who, like contraltos in general, love music full of tender sentiment, will find themselves best suited by it.

Christ being raised from the Dead. Anthem. By WILLIAM SPARK. [London: Novello, Ewer, & Co.]

THE first movement of this anthem is a bit of plain and unremarkable counterpoint. The second, a soprano solo and chorus, begins with a phrase for the former, responded to by the latter which is tiresomely repeated, even though slightly varied. Certain passages, however, are effective. The last chorus and fugue are well worked, and end the anthem impressingly.

BONN.—The erection of the great hall for the Beethoven Festival next August, was commenced on the 3rd inst.

LEIPSIC.—The eighteenth Gewandhaus Concert introduced two novelties, the "Kyrie" and "Gloria" from a Missa Solemnis, by E. F. Richter, and a Suite in Canon-Form, by Julius V. Grimm, both works being performed under the personal direction of their respective composers, and both being, also, well received.

ITALIAN OPERA, DRURY LANE.

MR. WOOD'S prospectus is out, and if (of which we have little doubt) all the things prospected come to pass, the season which opens on the 16th of next month, will be well worth remembering. Let us group the most attractive of them within a small compass.

First, as to new artists, and artists not new, but unfamiliar. Place aux dames, of course. Madame Volpini comes from St. Petersburgh; Mdlle. Lewitzky will show us the latest achievement of M. Wartel; Mdlle. Savertal brings the dramatic and vocal art which has gained her Italian fame; Mdlle. Rebour will suggest reminiscences of the Paris Grand Opéra; and Madame Monbelli is bent upon conquering the opera stage as she has already conqnered the concert platform. Among the gentlemen, Signor Perotti comes with good Italian credentials, so, also, do Signor Rinaldini and Signor Ragner. Last, but not least, appear Signor Verger and M. Faure. Add to this list the established names of Mesdames Nilsson, Sinico, Di Muraka, Trebelli; MM. Mongini, Bettini, Gardoni, Santley, Gassier, and Foli; and it will be seen with what a formidable array Mr. Wood enters on his first campaign. If it be true that Providence favours "big battalions," Drury Lane certainly will not want for super-human help. Practical men, however, may depend less on this, than on the fact that Signor Arditi is appointed sole "composer, conductor, and director of the music."

Now for the promised operas. The novelties are Mignon (Mdlle. Nilsson as the heroine); Der Pfiegewiler Hollander (Mr. Santley as the Dutchman); L'Oeil del Cairo (Mdlle. Lewitzky as Isabel); Abu Hassan (Mdme. Monbelli as Fatima); Les deux Journeés (Mr. Santley as the Water-carrier); Tancredi (Mdme. Trebelli in the title-rôle); Macbeth (Mdlle. Savertal as Lady Macbeth); and Signor Schira's Silvaggia, in which Mdme. Volpini appears. Is not this enough?

Behold, then, the attractions of Drury Lane; but not all. Last, not least, Mr. Jarrett is acting manager—a guarantee that real business is intended. For further information, vide the prospectus itself—a document such as rarely appears, and one entailing obligations on the issuer, which, if Mr. Wood bnt nearly fulfil, he will earn both name and fame.

THE DIAPASON NORMAL.

MR. BARNBY has addressed the subjoined letter to a contemporary:—

"To the Editor of the 'Pall Mall Gazette.'

"SIR—In a paragraph in your last evening's impression it is stated that I have resolved to abandon the use of the 'Diapason Normal.' Permit me to say such is not the case. Despite the difficulties I have encountered, the advantages have so far preponderated as to confirm my appreciation of its value. May I also say that I fail in following your course of reasoning when you say that those who are instrumental in keeping up the present 'intolerably high' pitch are not to be blamed for altering Beethoven's score? Did it never occur to them that a return to something like Beethoven's pitch would be the more legitimate proceeding?—Yours faithfully,

"March 12. J. BARNBY."

Doubtless, it has occurred to them; and it has also occurred to them that, unless Mr. Barnby be as wealthy as Crœsus, as determined and as strong as Hercules, he will never be able to carry out his idea in this country. Singers are, generally, indifferent to the change; players upon instruments are, for the most part, opposed to it—while Sir Michael Costa is imperatively antagonistic to any innovation whatever. Who and what is Sir Michael Costa, we need hardly remind Mr. Barnby. The "paragraph" referred to by Mr. Barnby was an "Occasional Note" in the Pall Mall Gazette of March 11, which we here reproduce:—

"That the 'Diapason Normal' is a failure in England may be gathered from the fact that Mr. Barnby, who introduced it into this country, has (we are informed) made up his mind to abandon it. At his concert on Wednesday night, when the Choral Fantasia and the Second Mass of Beethoven were given, the pianoforte part in the fantasia was played by Mdme. Arabella Goddard, upon a so-called 'semi-grand'—no grand concert pianoforte tuned to the lower pitch being in the possession of Messrs. Broadwood. Scarcely one pianist out of one hundred would have had the courage to brave such an ordeal, the pianoforte upon which Mdme. Goddard had to perform being not even a 'solo instrument,' but one used for accompaniments at concerts in the suburbs, brought up in a hurry for the occasion. To say truth, except by universal consent among musicians, the idea of modifying the pitch generally accepted in England, though intolerably high, both for voices and instruments, is out of the question; and now that Sir Michael Costa has, it is said, decided upon that pitch for the great organ at Kensington, the chance of amelioration is further off than ever. Nevertheless, although Mr. Barnby has spent a good deal of time, pains, and money (for new instruments from Paris) in vain, those who heard Beethoven's colossal Second Mass on Wednesday most probably heard it as Beethoven wrote and intended it for the last time, and have, therefore, good cause to remember the occasion. With our pitch, the Mass in D is simply impracticable; and no one can fairly blame Sir Michael Costa, under the circumstances, for making certain alterations in the vocal score. How it will fare with John Sebastian Bach's Passions-Musik—to be given shortly by Mr. Barnby's Choir in Exeter Hall—remains to be proved."

Now, we can vouch for the fact that what the Pall Mall Gazette said was on trustworthy authority. Several of the artists engaged on the occasion referred to were heard to declare positively that this concert was to be the last with the pitch of the "Diapason Normal." Among other reasons stated, were—first, that Mr Sims Reeves himself would no longer sing with that pitch; secondly, that Mr. Santley had refused, under any conditions, to sing with that pitch at the Oratorio Concerts; and lastly, that the members of the orchestra were against it almost to a man. We, like Mr. Barnby, may think them all in the wrong; but if Mr. Barnby imagines that a "Utopia" in musical affairs can be reached by the magic of his name alone, he is likely to be as wrong as the rest of them. If this clever and highly spirited professor fancies that he is already a Hercules, powerful enough to cleanse the Augean stable, let him set about it at once; we bid him "God speed." He cannot, however, we apprehend, alter the nature of things, though—like Porson, he may reasonably say "Confound them!"

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

Mr. J. Marsden, of Higher Broughton, Manchester, sends us some particulars respecting his pianoforte recitals. He appears to claim for them the merit of novelty, basing his claim on the fact that, instead of giving his audience classical music, he presents them with Kuhe's "Ireland," and such like. We regret our inability to assure Mr. Marsden of our sympathies. In the first place, drawing-room music wants no public expositors. It is already a bore. In the next place, we like to assist those who cry "Forward." Mr. Marsden would take the public back to the days of musical childhood. He must, therefore, "gang his ain gate," unassisted by us.

Let us honour an honourable effort in the cause of good music. Our readers know of the most useful concerts given from time to time by Mr. Henry Holmes, under the title of "Musical Evenings." A glance at the programme for Tuesday last will prove their usefulness. First, comes Beethoven's Quartet, Op. 132; next his Sonata in F for piano and violoncello; next, Heller's Caprice on Schubert's "La Truite," and next, Mr Holmes' own Quintet (for strings) in E major. The last deserves a more elaborate notice than we can give it here. But our present object is simply to call attention to its production, as the work of a clever English musician who is labouring zealously in a good cause. Besides the foregoing, the programme contained a short selection of songs. When we add that everything was confided to good artists, we have said enough.

With reference to our query as regards portions of the "Sanctus," in Beethoven's Second Mass, Mr. Joseph Barnby has kindly sent us the following:—

"In reply to your query in last week's Musical World, I have to say that had I not been firmly convinced I was carrying out Beethoven's intentions in causing the "Pleni sunt cœli" and "Osanna" to be sung in chorus, instead of soli, nothing would have induced me to make that arrangement. And I venture to think that very few musicians could be found who, after a careful examination of the score, would arrive at any other than the conclusion above mentioned.

"Gratefully acknowledging the kindly tone of your query, believe me, faithfully yours, J. Barnby."

We are fully assured that Mr. Barnby acted conscientiously in the matter, and we agree with him that the conclusion to which he came is one likely to be shared by every student of the score. It must be remembered, however, that Beethoven was a man sui generis, and by no means—especially when writing the Missa Solennis—amenable to ordinary rules. Moreover, a chance look into Schindler has proved that Mr Barnby's judgment led him astray. The biographer says:—"When we corrected the subscribers' copies, I pointed out to the illustrious author that these two movements (the 'Pleni sunt' and 'Osanna') executed by the choir, would have a grand effect, supporting my opinion by saying that the choir had very little to do in the 'Sanctus' and 'Benedictus,' and was reduced to be a simple auditor. Beethoven replied with loftiness and asperity, 'That must be for solo voices.'" Schindler's opinion as to how the music should be given remained unaltered, and so, doubtless, will that of Mr Barnby. But, henceforth, there can be no disputing Beethoven's intention.

The enemies of Prussian rule at Hesse-Cassel have lately been setting up a howl about the good old times—"all times when old are good"—and declaring that even the Theatre has been ruined by the blue-coated invaders, and is now no longer in the reign of the Elector what it was. To this charge, the Prussians and their adherents reply by saying that they own the Theatre is certainly not what it was, but for the simple reason that it is much better. In support of their assertion, they appeal to statistics. From these, it appears that in 1863, 1864, 1865, there were 62 classical dramas and 41 classical operas performed. In 1866, 1867, 1869, on the other hand, the number of classical dramas performed was 121, and of classical operas, 87. Of the 41 operatic performances given during the Electoral rule, 28 were supplied by Mozart, 3 by Beethoven, and 7 by Weber, while under the Prussian sway, Mozart's name figured 39 times in the bills, Beethoven's, 9, and Weber's, 22,—that is to say, the ration was as one to two. Facts are the Zundnadelgewehr (needle-gun) of argument, and the Prussians are in the present instance, as well provided with the former as they were well supplied with the latter at Sadowa.

A correspondent writing from Vienna to the Neue Berliner Musik-Zeitung, apropos of Herr R. Wagner's Meistersinger, says:—"I have just come from the Theatre. There was quite a disturbance at the production of Die Meistersinger. Even the overture was followed by hisses. This was the case with the first act also. The second was nearly not being finished. Immediately on Beckmesser's appearance, to sing the lute-serenade, there arose a most tremendous uproar, not to be appeased. The finale could not be heard at all for the noise. There was a struggle of several minutes between Wagnerites and Anti-Wagnerites. The former succeeded in getting up a number of calls, to which the artists responded every time the curtain was dropped. It was the third act, however, which really saved the opera. . . . There is a great deal, a very great deal, that is dreary in this work."

Philharmonic Concerts.—The first concert for the present season took place, in St. James's Hall, on Wednesday evening, under the direction of Mr. W. G. Cusins. The novel feature of the programme was Cherubini's Symphony in D, composed expressly for the Philharmonic Society. The hall was crowded. Full particulars in our next.

The annual concert of the Military Band of Messrs. John Broadwood & Sons' manufactory took place on Friday evening, the 11th inst., at the Pimlico Rooms, and was attended by a crowded audience. Besides the performances of the band, conducted by Mr. H. Sibold, which were much applauded, the following artists took part in the programme:—Miss Jessie Royd, Miss Helen Barron and Miss Pocklington; Messrs. Joseph Parry, Oxley, and George Buckland; Mr. Wiener (violin), the Masters Dove (cornet), and Messrs. C. S. Cook, Twyford, Taylor, and F. D. Smither (pianoforte). Encores were bestowed upon Miss Jessie Royd, Miss Pocklington, and Mr. George Buckland.

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

GADE'S "MICHAEL ANGELO."

The Daily News speaks as follows of Gade's overture, Michael Angelo, as played at the Crystal Palace last Saturday :—

"It is more than a quarter of a century since the first symphony of the young Danish composer, Niels Wilhelm Gade (who has now produced seven such works) attracted the attention and interest of Mendelssohn, then conducting the celebrated Gewandhaus Concerts at Leipsic. His high opinion of the work, and the hopes entertained of its author, may be gathered from the great composer's published letters to Gade, dated January and March, 1842, containing, among other encomiums, this passage—' Whoever wrote the last half of this scherzo is an admirable genius, and we have a right to expect the most grand and glorious works from him.' The gifted and genial Schumann formed high anticipations of Gade's future, taking it as a favourable omen that the letters of his name correspond with those which indicate the four strings of the violin. Although these predictions have scarcely been fulfilled, Herr Gade has produced much music agreeable to hear as the result of earnest thought and cultivated skill, besides having a certain northern tone which distinguishes it from the mass of modern imitative productions. The overture played on Saturday for the first time in England was written for concert performance, and is furnished with a distinctive title in accordance with a fashion that has largely prevailed since the glorious examples set by Mendelssohn, in his Midsummer's Night Dream, Meeresstille, Hebriden, and Schöne Melusine overtures. If Herr Gade's work falls far short of such precedents and of the suggestiveness of its subject, it yet contains much of the merit already claimed for its composer's productions, and this, with its effective instrumentation, heard in Saturday's performance, sufficed to procure for it a favourable reception."

MUSIC IN CHURCH.

The Choir, in the course of an article on the letter recently addressed by his parishioners to the Vicar of St. George's, Hanover Square, says :—

"Whatever may be the upshot of the discussion which is resulting from the action already taken, we heartily rejoice that what may fairly be termed 'a congregational cry for the choral service has been uttered, and that too from amongst those high pews and closely barred seats which are the very stronghold of the 'respectable Christianity' of the age. The collar has been worn long enough, and at last it is being felt to be slightly irksome. A fine building, with capabilities far exceeding those of most London churches, is proved to be utterly failing to do its work ; and, as it seems to us, Sir Robert Phillimore and his fellow-memorialists have pointed to the true cause for the empty seats, the absence of Church life, and the consequent lack of funds. In those parishes where a rich endowment secures to the clergy an ample income, it may be possible to continue the dismal ceremonial and the parson and clerk duet ; but experience is proving every day that where the people have the power of showing their taste, they invariably choose the hearty service and the order and decency which are happily becoming the rule amongst us. Not only are long, unmusical services prejudicial to the growth of religion and a hindrance to the popularization of the Church system among the masses, but they are a financial failure ; and although we are not quite ready to advocate the adoption of that which 'pays' solely because it does pay, still, as the memorialists wisely put it : 'We have abundant evidence that people in this great and rich country will give freely where their hearts are touched and their devotional feelings called forth, where the service is full of life, where it does not repel by its length nor weary by its monotony the average class of congregations, and thus, at all events, the experimental introduction of such services will be worth the trial, inasmuch as the failure of the present system is admitted to be complete.' This is common sense, and gives a forcible illustration of the remarks contained in our recent leading article, 'In Statu Quo.' That the effort will succeed, we sincerely trust ; and we may also add a hope that in other London parishes, where the Lion and Unicorn type of service prevails, a similar movement will be made."

J. S. B. AND F. M. B.

The Pall Mall Gazette of March 14, has the following interesting remarks about two novelties, in the "fugued" style, introduced at the Monday Popular Concert of the Monday previous :—

"Two novelties, both fugues with preludes, and both of singular merit, were in the last Monday Popular programme. One was Bach's Fantasia Cromatica in D minor for pianoforte ; the other, Mendelssohn's Capriccio in E minor (Op. 81), for a quartet of strings. With number in point of time, and the second written by an enthusiastic admirer of him who composed the first, their chance coming together gave each an additional interest. This result was caused more by unlikeness than resemblance. Of course resemblance made itself obvious, because what were the canons of art to Bach bound Mendelssohn equally. Hence, as far as mere outline goes, the fugue in E minor might be the work of the older master, and the fugue in D minor that of his successor. But, quite as obvious as this unity, which illustrated the unchangeable basis of art, was a variety which displayed the advance made from merely scientific music to that music combining science and sentiment. In this respect a tyro among the audience could not easily have mistaken the authorship of the works he heard. Bach's fugue had the effect of a mental exercise, that appealed to everyone in proportion as his mind had been cultivated with regard to it. It was, so to speak, a problem in mathematics worked out with passionless accuracy, every step in the demonstration of which some could follow with absorbing interest, while others saw nothing but figures chalked upon a black board. So, more or less, with all the scientific works of the older masters. But the power and end of music has been more fully revealed since their time; and even scholastic art is not what it once was. In fact, we have seen it less and less tolerated, till there is danger of going to an opposite extreme, and, in the race after 'idesity' upsetting all the musical order. Under such circumstances, examples of how the rigid forms of art can be made instinct with feeling are doubly valuable. One of these examples we have in Mendelssohn's fugue. Its construction is almost pedantic as respects conformity to regulation ; but, at the same time, it is so full of life, and of life with obvious sympathies and aims, that he who cannot understand it can feel it. There were, doubtless, among Mendelssohn's audience those to whom 'counterpoint in canon,' 'counterpoint inverted,' and 'theme direct' are meaningless terms, yet who joined in enjoying music which spoke, through such devices, with intelligence and power. When another Mendelssohn shall arise, he will carry on the lesson thus taught —a lesson certain, by that time, to be sorely needed, if, indeed, the reign of those have not begun. The respective preludes of Bach and Mendelssohn supplemented those proofs of change upon which we have dwelt. In one there is pure fancy, a display of virtuosity in musical thought, intended to exhibit virtuosity in executive power, and, at that, stopping short. In the other we see underlying to call forth emotion and suggest ideas. The introductory andante con moto (for example) is a genuine 'Song without words.' The performance of both compositions especially harmonized with their character. Herr Joachim led the quartet in almost passionate style; while, on the other hand, Mr. Hallé played Bach's music in a manner as sure and as emotionless as fate. Before quitting the subject, it may be well to mention that the Capriccio forms one of a series of pieces known as No. 9 of Mendelssohn's Posthumous Works ; and was written at Leipsic in 1843."

BEETHOVEN'S MASS IN D.

About the recent performance of Beethoven's Second Mass, at the Oratorio Concerts of Mr. Barnby, and about the Mass itself, the Pall Mall Gazette has the following observations :—

"After years of silence, Beethoven's Mass in D major was heard in St. James's Hall on Wednesday evening. Its performance was very natural and very laudable—natural because a new conductor and a young society sought distinction ; laudable because every work by Beethoven, and such a work above all, deserves regard. Seldom, however, does even the boldest of aspiring conductors fly at such high game as, in this instance, did Mr. Joseph Barnby. Prejudices in the Mass which stands among sacred compositions where the Choral Symphony stands among works of its class, involves such an amount of patient labour and executive skill, and has such a small chance of adequate reward, that only now and then is the attempt ventured. All the greater honour, therefore, belongs to Mr. Barnby, who both attempted and succeeded well nigh as far as success is possible when difficulties are insurmountable. It would be idle to encourage a belief that an absolute conquest of the Mass can ever be made. Music-writers with such a discord as the finale of a vocal power, both natural and acquired—music's no little adapted to kindle the enthusiasm of more than a few, and which treats the human organ as an orchestral instrument without giving the ability to play upon it—must bear an inevitable result. Mr. Barnby may labour, as he has laboured, and his choir may support him with unflagging zeal as they have supported him ; but in such a work there is no commanding other than partial success. To reach thus far may well content the workers. We are not going to discuss the details of Beethoven's extraordinary music ; because every musician, professional or amateur, has studied it more or less, and upon any body else time and space would be wasted. For nearly half a century the Mass has remained, what it was at the beginning, a sealed book to the majority ; to the few mostly, either a disappointment, or an idol only to be ignominiously worshipped at the best. About the first class we need not trouble ourselves ; but the disappointed people make themselves heard and must be regarded. One such, representing many we doubt not, has piteously begged for help in the columns of a contemporary. Impressed by the great name of Beethoven and the renown of the music, he went to hear, and came away to ask, 'Is this what I am expected to admire?' The querist is evidently prepared to do his duty as a man and an amateur, but needs assurance that a tremendous effort will not be utterly thrown away. For such assurance we would refer him to those Beethoven worshippers who believe their god most grandly displayed when shrouded in clouds and darkness. Even then the inquirer will need faith. The devotees will show things before which, if gifted with average discernment, he must stand wonderingly—masterstrokes of art that 'strike like a thunderbolt.' They will also utter phrases full of catch-words like 'idesity,' and 'abstract sublimity,' which the neophyte must accept as the evidence of things not seen by him, and but vaguely pointed out by his guides. A work so strange and mysterious is better left to make its own impression upon individual minds. Interference may only worse confound confusion."

The writer in our contemporary (alone among our musical reporters) has also the fairness to say a word about a great English artist, whose performance, at the same concert, of the pianoforte part of Beethoven's "Choral Fantasia," without rehearsal, and upon an instrument obtained at haphazard and at the last moment, from somewhere in the suburbs, was by no means the least remarkable feature of the evening:—

"Under what circumstances Mdme. Arabella Goddard played in the Choral Fantasia at this concert was mentioned by us last week. We did not then say, however, that her brilliant execution made all possible amends for a defective instrument."

We have not too many genuine musical artists in England; but those we can boast of are entitled at least to some show of consideration (if not of courtesy).

English Orchestras.

Apropos of Leslie's last concert the Athenæum says:—

"But the orchestra was imperfect, as usual. It lacked refinement, and fell a long way short of precision. For this we do not blame Mr. Leslie, who secured the best available men; neither do we blame the men, who worked conscientiously at their tasks. Both suffered from a system which makes the general run of concert-giving in England a farce. The rule is to have no orchestral rehearsals if any excuse can be found for doing without them; if not, then one scramble through the music, amid impatient glances at the clock, suffices. Herein lies the reason why English orchestras, with excellent materials, produce unsatisfactory results. An orchestra is a delicate machine, the parts of which, no matter how perfect in themselves, must well fit together before its object can be best attained. An average English orchestra is a machine loosely riveted which goes grinding on with a system which makes the perhaps under the nominal control of a man ignorant of its defects and helpless to amend them. How far all this is a necessity we cannot tell. If it be a necessity, more's the pity; if not, more's the shame."

The Mass in D.

One of the audience went home from Mr. Barnby's concert and wrote to the editor of the Sunday Times in the character of a representative man. He said:—

"Sir,—From a constant perusal of your musical notices, both as to the works performed and the performances themselves, I find that occasionally, though you might speak of a work as being well received and relished by an audience, yet, at the same time, you may deprecate the piece performed as not being conducive of the love of true art, and as not raising the minds of those who hear it. Now, as not disagreeing with you in the least as to the justness of your censure in such cases, ought you not, as critics, to judge very closely the productions of those composers who are generally looked up to as models of excellence for the young musicians to reverence and emulate? On Wednesday, as almost in duty bound, I took myself off to St. James Hall to hear Beethoven's Mass in D. I went with a full purpose of liking it if I could, though I felt somewhat dubious, having purchased the score a day or two before; well what did I hear? I heard many beauties, of course. How could Beethoven compose anything without beauties? but much of it was to me quite painful especially the loud finales of the 'Gloria' and 'Credo.' I should think in the case of either of these pieces, for fifteen mortal minutes, voices were screaming out notes that their voices were never meant for, and then running after each other in close imitation—all, no doubt, according to the rules of counterpoint and fugue, trumpets were blowing, drums were beating, sans intermission, and confusion seemed worse confounded, and all this time not a gleam of melody to awaken human interest. Am I expected as one of the public to like this music? is this the sort of thing that the public after hearing much of it expected to like? and ought I, not liking it, to be looked upon as one not having proper taste?—I remain yours, &c., Perhaps a Stupid Fellow."

The Monday "Pops."

Some recent novelties at these concerts are discussed in the Athenæum as thus:—

"Two novelties were brought forward at the Popular Concert of Monday—Mendelssohn's posthumous Capriccio in E minor (Op. 81), and J. S. Bach's Fantasia Cromatica in D minor. The former is written for two violins, viola, and violoncello; and opens with a short andante of the Lieder ohne Worte type. So far there is nothing either new or striking. The case is different with the spirited and masterly fugue which follows. Built upon an admirable diatonic subject, this movement passes through a series of elaborate developments to one of the most original climaxes the art can show. Though Mendelssohn has not here exhausted fugal device, he has employed some of its most effective forms to singularly good purpose. We might instance, for example, the counterpoint in canon which waits upon the 'answers,' and gives such striking unity to the work. We might instance, also, the masterly inversion of both counterpoint and theme, and a perdole as closely knit as any to be found out of Bach; adding that the fugue runs from end to end with a freedom which is the best test of a master in this branch of art. The entire work was encored, and repeated; appearing, therefore, to suffer nothing by the rapid pace at which it was played. Yet we think that pace a fault. The speed of a fugue should be inversely as its intricacy. As soon as the design becomes indistinct, so also does the meaning. Bach's Fantasia Cromatica was played by Mr. Charles Hallé with remarkable neatness and precision. Not a note was wanting, not a note was superfluous, and not a note was out of place. Bearing in mind the difficulty of the music this is great praise; but the able artist might have earned greater had he chosen,—had he, for example, united some degree of feeling to perfect mechanism. Even fugues require more than rigid accuracy; and there is a consciousness of waste when a great artist like Mr. Hallé does what might be as well done by machinery. Nevertheless—perhaps we should say all the more—the structure of Bach's music was laid bare in a manner admirably clear, and Mr. Hallé was loudly applauded."

Dr. Bennett's Symphony in G Minor.

The Athenæum remarks about a recent performance of this work:—

"Dr. Sterndale Bennett's admirable Symphony in G minor was played at the Crystal Palace Concert of Saturday, for the first time. Seeing that it is now six years old, surprise may be felt at this tardy production. But let us in fairness to Mr. Manns remember that the symphony is unpublished, and that the MS. belongs to a society which manages property of the sort upon strictly conservative principles. It is easier to believe in Mr. Manns' difficulty as to copies than in his reluctance to produce the work. As a matter of fact, reluctance with regard to such music is incredible. Dr. Bennett has written in a style so engaging, has crowded his symphony with such charming themes, and so thrown over all the classic refinement which marks the production of a master, that he not only deserves, but commands, admiration. This was ungrudgingly conceded by the Crystal Palace audience, who applauded every movement (encoring the minuetto) as heartily as though the work had borne a foreign name. The performance was excellent, more particularly that of the delicate 'Romanza per le Viole,' wherein twelve instruments played the theme as one, and with almost perfect taste."

At the Crystal Palace Concert, to-day, besides a Symphony in C by Haydn (first time), the overture called Les Francs Juges, by Berlioz, and Mendelssohn's Walpurgis Night are in the programme.

Le Figaro says that "Madame Parker," wife of the English Ambassador at the court of Japan, is now giving lessons on the piano to the "Mikadette." His Majesty of Austria presented an instrument to the Mikado, and the immediate result, says Le Figaro, was "Madame Parker's" engagement.

We take M. J. B. Wekerlin to be the most prolific composer of our day. He has just informed Le Télégraphe that in his portfolio there are no fewer than twenty-five dramatic works. Such industry and such perseverance in the teeth of an unappreciating world deserve to be noted.

A Paris contemporary rebukes those gossips who are for ever discussing in the public papers the marriage prospects of Mdlle. Nilsson. "Outside the theatre," says La France Musicale, "Mdlle. Nilsson belongs no more to the newsmonger than to the critic. We hope the journals to whom this advice is addressed will take due note of it." Our contemporary may rest assured they will do nothing of the kind.

Whether Fräulein Laura walks the rope at Holborn Amphitheatre safely or not, it is some comfort to hear of the withdrawal of the child whose life she used to risk with her own. Dr. Lush asked a question in the House of Commons, and was told that the result of the Home Secretary's inquiry had been that the child was no longer carried, and that the other portion of the exhibition had been rendered "as little dangerous as possible." We are at a loss to know what is meant by this. It would infer an absolute necessity that the public should be entertained with Fräulein Laura's performances at all hazards. If they can be conducted without risk, good; if not, they must be rendered "as little dangerous as possible." We appear to us there is no need of performances which involve danger to the performers. Of course the performers are always ready to incur danger; but if it is undesirable they should do so, they can only be prevented by authority in the form of prohibition.

By mail from America we are informed of the style in which Miss Lydia Thompson cowhides an editor, backed in the game by two of our compatriots, furnished with whip and revolver. A few months ago, Miss Thompson and her troupe—the Blonde Troupe"—exercised the transatlantic press almost as much as Mr. Boucicault our own with Formosa. The critics were divided: to one the breakdowns, puns, &c., were importations to be received with applause and bouquets; the opposition followed Matthew Paynes in his "Hairdresser," and scourged the performance with a severity that Stephen Grosson might envy. They went so far as to challenge the bona fides of Miss Thompson's chignon, and suggested that the "waterfall of gold," could be put on and off at will. The actress came forward in defence of her hair, and on that point baffled the assailants. What Mr. Storey did to bring down the vengeance of the "Blonde company," we can only conjecture. Miss Thompson was assisted by a Miss Markham, of the London stage, and a knout had been provided for Miss Wenderby, who did not, however, come to the scratch. In the School for Tigers, and the jockey pieces, whips are "your only wear," and the fashion of using them may, under certain influences, have developed into their being carried about as weapons. We do not know the particulars of the quarrel, but are not sorry that differences of opinion between actresses and critics can be settled without the cowhide in an "effete country." Imagine a critic hunted by blonde actresses in Rotten Row, the ladies armed with gutta-percha canes, and the manager supporting them with a revolver, while the literary gentleman feels in his pocket for his own six-shooter!

HERR IGNAZ MOSCHELES, the celebrated pianist and composer, died suddenly, at an early hour, on the 10th inst. He was born at Prague in 1794, and was consequently in his 76th year. He had recovered, as it was supposed, only a short time, from a long illness, and was believed to be completely out of danger, when an unexpected relapse carried him off. He had been attached, as professor, to the Conservatory here ever since 1846.

Moscheles.

Another link in the chain which binds us to the last generation of musicians has just been broken. Herr Ignaz Moscheles, or as he is better known to many hundreds of his friends and acquaintances in England—Mr. Moscheles—died on Thursday week, the 10th March, at his house at Leipsic, at the ripe age of seventy-six. The genial good old man, who had been intimate with Schubert and Beethoven, Spohr and Cherubini, the valued friend of Mendelssohn and Schumann, Ernst and Paganini, and who was so fond of telling the recollections of these great men, has passed away to join his old friends and can never be consulted by any of us again.

Moscheles cannot be said to have been born on the further side of the French Revolution, but he came into the world on the eve of a movement not less important to music than that was to the politics and the life of Europe generally. He was born on the 30th May, 1794, when Beethoven was only sixteen, six years before the appearance of the first of those nine symphonies which achieved such a revolution in the art. His parents were Israelites (his real family name was Moses), and he was born in Prague, where he received his first instruction, and where, before he was twelve years old, his playing had achieved an immense reputation.

Vienna was at that time the metropolis of music, and it was natural that Moscheles should be sent to the city from which Haydn had just departed, and where Beethoven and Schubert were in the full vigour of their powers. He arrived there about the year 1810, and immediately put himself under the guidance of Albrechtsberger and Salieri; he was also a pupil of Beethoven, and lived with him in great intimacy, and I have myself heard him mention how often he had seen him, conversed with him, and heard him play. In fact it is impossible that a young musician of the ardour and enthusiasm which Moscheles possessed to the day of his death, could have lived in Vienna without getting more or less intimate with the great master of his art. On that great day for music, the 18th December, 1813, when Beethoven's seventh symphony was first produced in the University Hall, for the benefit of the Austrian soldiers wounded at Hanau, Moscheles was amongst the throng of artists who pressed forward to assist their chief, and he played the cymbals by the side of Meyerbeer and Hummel who had the drums. Although, as may be imagined from the instructors under whom he placed himself, he paid great attention to composition, yet pianoforte playing was at that time and always the immediate object of his life. He then laid the foundation of that extraordinary reputation as a player which attended him for so many years.

In 1816, Moscheles visited the north of Germany, but shortly returned to his practice in Vienna. In 1820 he took a longer flight, and after a lengthened stay in Paris, where his playing created the greatest enthusiasm, he arrived, in 1824, in London, bringing with him his wife, Miss Embden of Hamburgh, whom he had married in the preceding year. Thenceforward, for 22 years, London became his home, where he lived surrounded by a very large circle of admiring and affectionate friends and pupils. He very soon became Professor at the Royal Academy, Director of the Philharmonic Society, and was listened to with delight at all the concerts of the day. Mendelssohn was his regular pupil,* and one of his greatest friends; it was at his house that the young genius lived during his first visits to London, and many of Mendelssohn's most brilliant, most comical, most affectionate, and most admirable letters, embellished with sketches and drollery which would make the fortune of a caricaturist, were among the treasures of his album, which the good old man delighted to show to his visitors at Leipsic. "Many remembrances from the Moscheles," says he in one of his charming letters. "They are excellent people; and after so long an interval it is truly delightful to meet an artist who is not a victim to envy or jealousy or miserable egotism. He makes continued and steady progress in his Art."

At the pianoforte concerts, or as they would now be called, "Recitals,"† which Moscheles gave on his own account, the programmes were distinguished for their great research, and for the admirable tact and knowledge which he displayed in bringing forward the works of ancient masters. Many fine and curious compositions of Bach, Scarlatti, Handel, Mozart, Clementi, Woelfl, and Beethoven (at that time as little known as any of them), were first heard at Mr. Moscheles' concerts.‡ He was also celebrated for his powers of improvization, the recollection of which is sufficient to warm into enthusiasm even a critic so little liable to excitement as Monsieur Fétis:—

"His extempore playing was the result of a great natural gift developed by labour and thought. The number of his ideas was so prodigious, and the contrivances with which he developed them so clever and so happy that it was difficult to believe that his improvizations were not prepared beforehand; but no one who was in the habit of hearing them could have any doubt that they were really extemporaneous. Doubtless the general form into which he cast his spontaneous thoughts was the result of study, just as is the case with an extempore speech. When a subject is given to an artist who possesses this talent, he sees in a moment the resources which it contains, and subordinates one part to another in a regular gradation; and what distinguishes an extempore performance from a written composition, is the frequent and unexpected sallies which diversify and adorn the regular form of the piece. This precious talent is possessed by a few, and probably no one ever employed it to a higher degree than Moscheles. I was at a concert at Brussels in the year 1835, when three themes were offered him for improvization. Not content with choosing one out of three, he first of all treated each in succession, and then united the three in the most exquisite manner, giving them alternately in each hand, and making each accompany the others, and all without the least hesitation, or a moment's failure in the progress of the interest. The applause at the end of this extraordinary performance was something prodigious, and I confess that if I had not heard it, I could not have believed in the possibility of such a feat."§

In October, 1846, on the foundation of the Conservatoire of Music at Leipsic, Mendelssohn induced Moscheles to transfer his abode to that city, and take the post of professor of the piano at the new institution; and there he remained, esteemed and beloved by all who knew him, until the day of his death.

His compositions are principally for the piano, and are very numerous, embracing some of the best music for that instrument. The list contains six sonatas for piano solo, six pieces for four hands, twenty-two fantasias and rondos, thirteen divertissements and polonaises, three books of studies which will never be superseded, eight concertos for piano and orchestra, the well-known "Souvenirs d'Irelande," a trio, a septuor, and other concerted pieces. In addition to these, he composed for the orchestra a symphony and several overtures, and he conferred a great benefit on the literature of music by translating Schindler's biography of Beethoven, with many additions by himself and extracts from Beethoven's correspondence. This, it is true, has been since partially superseded by Schindler's second and third editions, but the book remains the only approach to a life of Beethoven that we possess in English.

An English musician, one of his most favourite and most distinguished pupils, writes to me as follows:—

"Amongst his many good and endearing qualities, nothing was more striking than the encouragement and help he gave to young artists. By advice, or by using the influence which his position naturally gave him, he gladly assisted those who were beginning the steep ascent which he had himself climbed so brilliantly and successfully. The almost fatherly interest he displayed in his pupils whilst they were under him, and the delight with which he afterwards watched them successfully working out their artistic career, are pleasant recollections to those whose good fortune it was to have been amongst the number. There are many of his old pupils in England now, who can testify to this, and who will always bear his kindness to them in grateful and affectionate remembrance."‖ (O.)

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

Friedemann Bach's "Dramatic Fantasia."

The Sunday Times, of March 20, has the following about Madame Goddard's recent performance of this new and very interesting "Revival":—

"A novelty was introduced at this concert by Madame Arabella Goddard which deserves attention. The work alluded to was a Fantasia Drammatica by Friedemann Bach, just published for the first time as one of Duncan Davison & Co.'s 'Revivals.' The fantasia consists of several movements, varied in style, full of melody, masterly as to treatment, and easy to play. An interesting feature is the connection of several parts by means of recitative, which gives to the work a genuine dramatic character. After saying thus much it will be assumed that we attach importance to the publication, not merely for the sake of the thing published, but also for the sake of the composer, who has scarcely been treated according to his deserts. Madame Goddard played the fantasia with her customary perfection of style and manipulative skill. She has so often brought forward novelties that there will be nothing fresh in the remark that she read the music as though it had been an old acquaintance."

Sims Reeves.

The Pall Mall Gazette (March 21st) gives the following account of our greatest singer's temporary "farewell" concert in St. James's Hall:—

"Mr. Sims Reeves, being on the point of a journey to Italy, took a public farewell of his friends in St. James's Hall on Friday evening. His friends responded in such numbers that the place was far too small for them; and, it is said, many hundreds were turned from the doors. The disappointed ones lost more than a leave-taking, for their favourite tenor was in excellent voice, as well as in a mood to humour encores; besides which, the concert generally turned out an excellent thing of its kind. Mr. Reeves sang nothing but songs he has made emphatically his own. 'Deeper and deeper still,' 'Adelaide,' 'My Pretty Jane,' and 'Tom Bowling,' are now associated with the vocalist who succeeded to the honours of Braham, and so they are likely to remain while he keeps before the public. Mr. Reeves' title to them was never clearer than on Friday evening. The pathos of his singing in Handel's recitative and air, the classic purity with which he rendered Beethoven's love-music, the exquisite delicacy manifested in Bishop's song, and the truthful sentiment infused into Dibdin's ballad, were each, perhaps, unapproachable, certainly unapproached. With regard to the two more important airs, Mr. Reeves was fortunate in his accompaniments; those to 'Deeper and deeper still' being played by Mr. Arthur Sullivan, and those to 'Adelaide' by Mdme. Arabella Goddard, whose services he cordially volunteered. Need it be said that the audience applauded furiously, or that they demanded everything twice? It may, however, be necessary to state that the singer yielded twice to their importunities. * * * The concert was a thorough success, materially as well as artistically."

Bennett and Mendelssohn.

The same paper in its very interesting and comprehensive article on "concerts," of Monday, thus refers to the "Chamber Trio" of our countryman, Sterndale Bennett, and the "Posthumous Studies" of our quasi-countryman, Felix Mendelssohn, both performed at the Monday Popular Concert of March 14th:—

"Dr. Sterndale Bennett's trio in A major for piano, violin, violoncello, so long a stranger to these concerts, must have proved welcome to everybody. The official analyst declares the trio 'one of the most familiar of Dr. Bennett's instrumental works, having been included in the programmes of almost all our chamber concerts.' We are glad to receive this assurance for the sake of a gifted composer and of music as charming as the most exacting taste could wish. Every movement is thoroughly characteristic. Dr. Bennett has a style of his own, not to be confounded with that of any other; but most distinctive of all in this trio is a 'serenade' wherein pianoforte sings a theme to a pizzicato accompaniment for the strings. The working out of this original idea is marked by exquisite delicacy, and by an effect satisfactory to cultivated and uncultivated alike. Monday's audience were fairly the captives of its beauty, and the movement was received with what more nearly resembled enthusiasm than any feeling usually evoked by an Englishman's music. In justice let us say that this may have been partly due to a performance of rare and striking merit—merit not surpassable, perhaps, by any combination of talent. When such artists as Madame Arabella Goddard, Herr Joachim, and Signor Piatti are engaged upon a work we may well despair of its falling into better hands. Mendelssohn's three 'Posthumous Studies' furnished the pianoforte solo. Our remarks upon these works when played last year by Herr Paner, need no addition; but it is necessary to say that Madame Goddard gave each study in so faultless a manner that difficulties seemed to disappear altogether, and only by resisting the illusion could the full merit of her performance be made obvious. A finer display of executive skill in combination with artistic taste it would be vain to expect. The last study was encored and repeated."

The Athenæum (March 19th) speaks as follows of the same pieces:—

"Dr. Bennett's 'Chamber Trio' in A major, for piano, violin, and violoncello, is a good example of our English composer. Written throughout with delicacy and grace, the work has most reason to boast of a serenade in which those qualities are very conspicuous. With its theme given to the piano, accompanied pizzicato by the other instruments, novel effect is added to music a great master might own with pride. This movement was encored, but, without adequate cause, and the whole trio was played faultlessly by Madame Goddard, Herr Joachim, and Signor Piatti. It is no light thing to say that each artist proved worthy of the other two. Mendelssohn's three Posthumous Studies for pianoforte made up the solo of the evening, and afforded Madame Goddard all needful scope for her executive powers. How those powers were manifested those who know the difficult music and the accomplished pianist may imagine. Enough if we say that the artist had to repeat one study at the command of an audience quite disposed to rehear the whole."

The same paper chronicles as below the first performance of another unknown fantasia, by Wilhelm Friedemann Bach:—

"In Saturday's Popular Concert programme there was one novelty of mark—a 'Dramatic Fantasia' for pianoforte, by W. Friedemann Bach, now first published. The great John Sebastian's gifted son is brought one step nearer due recognition by this event. He certainly appears to advantage, both in the matter of original form and attractive details. Starting with an allegro (a genuine fantasia), the work successively introduces a melodious and graceful vivace of regular construction, and a 'dramatic scene,' in which several distinct movements, admirably varied as to character, are connected by recitatives. The development of this scene is highly interesting, and the fantasia, as a whole, deserves more than passing notice. It was played by Madame Arabella Goddard (whose mission is to search after hidden treasure) with great taste and with a carefulness which overlooked not a single point. Schubert's quintet (Op. 163), and Beethoven's sonata (Op. 30) were also in the programme, together with two songs which Miss Annie Edmonds sang very sweetly."

The Philharmonic Concert.

On two points of interest connected with the Philharmonic Concert of Wednesday week, the Pall Mall Gazette says:—

"Wednesday's concert began with a symphony written for the society by Cherubini, and performed for the first time on the 24th April, 1815. Its success with the Philharmonic audience of that day does not seem to have been great, for the work was shelved and forgotten till 1864. We do not feel disposed to quarrel with the taste of half a century ago on this matter. It was wrong, no doubt, to forget Cherubini's symphony, because every important work, by so great a master, must have uses, and consequently value. But we think, nevertheless, that the music puts substantial obstacles in the way of its own success. It wants individuality to a much greater extent than usual with Cherubini; it is often dry and laboured; and generally conveys the idea of having been written to order. From these remarks we must, however, except the minuet and trio, which fully sustain the composer's reputation. Finally, Madame Norman-Neruda in an artist of consummate ability nobody disputes. It is also beyond question that much violin music, written to be played with masculine vigour and breadth of style, lies outside her proper repertory. Among this must be classed the first and third movements of Mendelssohn's concerto, in which, passages here and there excepted, the lady by no means satisfies critical ears. When dealing with music demanding sentiment and delicacy—such as, for example, the slow movement in Mendelssohn's work—Madame Neruda leaves hardly anything to desire; and it would be well, therefore, if some discrimination were exercised in the choice of works for her use. To these remarks we must add that the Philharmonic audience seemed equally delighted with everything she did, and applauded the finale which was faulty, just as much as the andante, which was perfect. No doubt a genuine artist like Madame Neruda appreciates such gallantry at its true worth."

The Mass in D.

The remarks of the Athenæum upon this work and its recent performance in St. James's Hall are subjoined:—

"Mr. Joseph Barnby's performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis showed that the work still remains impracticable. The attempt to conquer its difficulties was, however a gallant one. An excellent choir spared neither time nor labour; a quartet of principal voices made fewer mistakes than usual, and the band, we are told, actually enjoyed the advantage of two rehearsals. Yet the performance, relatively one of merit, was absolutely one of faults. For this let us not blame the executants. A dozen careful repetitions would, of course, have surmounted all but insurmountable obstacles; but talk of what is practically out of the question may be spared. Mr. Barnby and his subordinates were bound to fail; it is creditable to them that they failed with honour. The audience, it may be assumed, received various impressions. Nevertheless, let us hope that all recognized the genius which spoke with such astonishing power. We need not go through the work, and show the great ideas abounding in it; ideas that create, even in the most appreciative minds a sense of yet undiscovered grandeur. These are known—though, at most, inadequately—to all musicians; and it is these that make not a few less tolerant of what seem purposeless difficulties. Practical men ask why power so obvious in comparative simplicity should hide itself at any time where discovery is only possible after sore assertion. They ask whether music so unvocal, so elaborate, and so hard to be understood, is necessary to the utterance of the highest thought. These questions, however, are scarcely consistent, because only a greater than Beethoven could answer them. Enough that an unequalled genius, at a time when his powers were ripest, brought forth the Mass, and declared it his most perfect work. All that remains to be done is to conquer such difficulties as are conquerable, having faith in ultimate reward. But there are idealists whom the Mass never troubles. Beethoven is their god, and they are prepared to trust him where they cannot trace him. Hence, just as Robert Irving used to bow his head in adoration at the sound of the 'unknown tongues,' these people listen reverently to Beethoven's obscurest utterances. Superstition is sometimes respectable, and here is a case in point; all the same, however: discerning conviction is better than blind faith. We shall be glad to have the Mass oftener performed on this account. For the most part, it has been kept in seclusion, and spoken of as vaguely as a Thibetian might speak of the Grand Llama. True the cost and labour demanded by even an ordinary production are enough to deter managers. But Art needs martyrs; and the braver the cross the brighter the crown. This, doubtless, is Mr. Barnby's compensation."

Berlioz and Haydn.

The conjunction of Les Francs Juges and Haydn's "Letter R" at the Crystal Palace, led to the following remarks in the Pall Mall Gazette:—

"Berlioz's overture, Les Francs Juges, was a great—we will not say an attractive—feature of Saturday's concert at the Crystal Palace. It used often to be heard by the patrons of the late M. Jullien; and probably stood as high in their estimation as the 'Row Folks.' But at the Crystal Palace it appeared for other and better reasons than excessive noise. The overture is an example, according to Berlioz, of the 'programme music' which some in these latter days, consider the fullest development of art. As such we can understand its claims upon Mr. Manns' consideration. The excellent conductor has analysed it with becoming gravity; labouring, however, under the slight disadvantage of not knowing what programme his 'programme music' was meant to illustrate. "The hearer may construct for himself,' says Mr. Manns,' * * * * Incidents and drama of the most tremendous nature, if he has a turn for so doing.' Of course, out of compliment to M. Berlioz, the hearer will base his fancy upon what he knows of the terrible Vehmgerichte. Otherwise he might make the overture as depicting an earthquake, or a bombardment, or an eruption of Mount Vesuvius, which it does in each case quite as forcibly as it illustrates the doings of a secret tribunal. Concluding his remarks, Mr. Manns observes that the overture 'cannot fail to afford pleasure to all, and instruction to young composers,' &c. As regards the latter we quite agree with Mr. Manns—it teaches young composers what to avoid. For this reason, and because the public should know whither modern music tends, we were glad to see Les Francs Juges in the programme. Mr. Manns would next bring forward King Lear. If, as some might think, M. Berlioz supplied the bane, the antidote was furnished by Haydn, whose charming symphony in C (latter R) followed, and was heard for the first time at those concerts. After the din and confusion of the modern Frenchman, the tuneful likeness and orderly construction of the old German came as a positive relief. Never, we imagine, did they produce a greater effect; but, under much less favourable circumstances. Haydn's music would be heard with pleasure, more especially the andante, which is an unbroken stream of delicious tune. The entire work was played to perfection, Messrs. Wallis (flute) and Crozier (oboe) distinguishing themselves greatly in the sole passages given to their respective instruments."

Coblenz.—At the sixth and last Sinfonie-Soirée for the season, the new Symphony in D minor, by Herr R. Wüerst, was greatly admired.

Halle.—The members of the Singacademie, assisted by Herr Wiedemann, from Leipsic, and Herr Hasselbeck, from Munich, lately performed Mendelssohn's St. Paul, before a most numerous and appreciative audience. Herr Virolzeh was the conductor.

Hamburgh.—Weber's Oberon has been revived, after a lapse of several years. It is exceedingly well put upon the stage.—At the eighth Philharmonic Concert, Dr. Ferdinand Hiller conducted a new orchestral work entitled Symphonische Fantasie. He then performed Mozart's Concerto, in D minor, and a Gavotte and Impromptu, the latter, like the Fantasie, being from his own pen. Its was most heartily applauded.

CRYSTAL PALACE OPERAS.

Mr. George Perren and his English Opera Company have resumed their performances in the new Crystal Palace Theatre. It is satisfactory to observe that increased efforts are being made to do what is attempted in a fashion worthy the place. Mr. Perren has made an admirable selection of an opening work. Benedict's Lily of Killarney may certainly claim to rank among the best of English operas. Throughout tuneful and masterly, it pleases alike the cultivated and uncultivated ear. A serious and successful effort has been made to produce the work effectively, so far as appointments go. The scenery is picturesque, and the general mounting of the opera must be accounted much in advance of anything yet done on the same stage. Mr. Manns' orchestra, of course remains as usual, for the excellent reason that it could not be improved. Mr. Perren has gathered round him a tolerably strong company. It would be idle to pretend that there is not room for improvement, as idle, in point of fact, as to expect that, with so few opportunities for gaining experience, English lyric artists can ever be thoroughly satisfactory. Nevertheless the Lily of Killarney goes well; better, perhaps, in the musical than in the dramatic department. Madame Florence Lancia is an agreeable Eily O'Connor, and sings with both fluency and expression. In "My Wild Mountain Valley," she makes a specially good effect by legitimate means. The Mrs. Cregan of Miss Annie Goodall is another satisfactory feature; and as Anne Chute Miss Emmeline Cole finds plenty of admirers. Mr. Perren, we need hardly say, assumes the part of Hardress Cregan, and devotes all the energy and intelligence which has marked his previous impersonations. The director-artist is evidently in favour with his audience; and who shall say that favour is undeserved? Certainly not ourselves. The other male characters are taken by Mr. Edward Cotte (Myles), Mr. G. Fox (Mr. Corrigan), Mr. R. Temple (Father Tom), Mr. W. H. Hillier (O'Moore), and Mr. Aynsley Cooke (Danny Mann), whose good singing and long experience of stage business distinguish him greatly, and make him a most important accession to Mr. Perren's company. The revival of Mr. Benedict's opera is a success; and we are not surprised at so natural a result.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

The programme on Saturday, the 19th inst., was rich in attraction, a fact which simply quoting it will prove:—

Overture, "Les Francs Juges"		Berlioz.
Aria, 'Vedrò mentr'io sospiro" (Figaro)—Mr. L. Thomas ...		Mozart.
Symphony in C		Haydn.
"Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage"...		Beethoven.
Song, "O Araby" (Oberon)—Miss Elton		Weber.
Recit and air, "Costanza" (Seraglio)—Mr. Cummings ...		Mozart.
"The First Walpurgis Night"		Mendelssohn.
Overture, "Semiramide"		Rossini.

The overture in which Berlioz has expressed his ideas about the terrible "Vehmgerichte" is an extraordinary thing. We set aside altogether its pretensions as "programme music" for the reason Mr. Manns gives us in his analysis:—

"No two hearers can agree as to the meaning of a single bar, unless by pure chance."

Programme music which may mean anything is obviously absurd. Looking at the overture as music, we find here and there a pleasing or masterly passage; but, for the most part, it suggests the breaking loose of some musical "Bedlam," or a civil war among the elements of cacophony. From Les Francs Juges to Haydn's symphony was like passing from the whistling circumference of a cyclone to the centre, where all is peace. The old master's delightful music, with its pure melody, and its symmetrical form, never was more welcome, perhaps never more enjoyed. We cannot now discuss the work at length, even if discussion were necessary. But Haydn is always Haydn, and his name calls up ideas which need no enforcement. Beethoven's Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage (for chorus and orchestra) suffered by a bad performance. The choir sang much out of tune. The Walpurgis Night was heard to more advantage, the chorus being efficient, and the soloists well up to their work. Miss Elton sang "Know ye not a deed so daring" well; Mr. Cummings did entire justice to "Now May again;" while the more important music of the Druid priest was given by Mr. Lewis Thomas with conscientious care and appropriate dignity of style. The miscellaneous vocal pieces were well chosen.

MR. SIMS REEVES'S CONCERT.

The hold which the greatest of English tenors (or, for that matter, the greatest of tenors) still has upon public regard was conclusively shown on Friday evening week, in St. James's Hall, on the occasion of his benefit concert. Mr. Sims Reeves being about to quit England for a while, a public leave-taking was a very natural, and, as the result proved, a very satisfactory procedure. The audience crowded the hall in every part, and such an anxiety to be present was manifested that hundreds were turned away from the doors. This was well, because showing how thoroughly a great artist is appreciated ever when circumstances compel him, as they often do Mr. Reeves, to disappoint his admirers.

The favourite tenor sang four songs, and accepted two encores. It will be assumed that, doing so, he was in good voice, and that the audience enjoyed a rare treat. In "Deeper and deeper still" Mr. Reeves (accompanied by Mr. Arthur Sullivan), touched every heart by the intense feeling he threw into Handel's pathetic music. But a yet greater success was obtained in "Adelaide." Sung to absolute perfection, and equally well accompanied by Madame Arabella Goddard (whose services for that purpose were gracefully proffered), the audience heard Beethoven's matchless love song according to Beethoven's ideal. We say this confidently, because it is not possible to imagine anything better. It may be asserted with less confidence that the audience heard it as they will never hear it again, unless under similar circumstances. Mr. Reeves's third song, Bishop's "My pretty Jane," was encored, and its last verse repeated. The fourth, "Tom Bowling" (the very perfection of ballad writing, helped out by the very perfection of ballad singing), was also demanded again; but, for it, J. L. Hatton's "Good-bye, Sweetheart" was substituted, to the obvious delight of all present. It is quite needless to say that the audience kept enthusiasm up to a high pitch all the evening.

Apart from Mr. Reeves, a good deal was done of an interesting sort, at which, however, we can only glance. Mr. Leslie's Choir sang a selection of part-music with great success; Madame Carola and Miss Stephens each gave two songs; Mr. Coccen played two pianoforte solos (one, Bach's Fantasia Cromatica); and Madame Norman-Neruda gave the slow movement from one of Spohr's concertos, and Vieuxtemps' Air Varié in D. Mr. Henry Leslie conducted with his accustomed care and intelligence. Messrs. Calcott and Sydney Naylor accompanied certain vocal pieces.

NEW PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

The nineteenth season commenced on Wednesday night at St. James's Hall—this being the second year of their removal from St. George's Hall, Langham Place, to which new building they were transferred from the former locality in 1867. The concerts, directed and conducted by Dr. Wylde, have long been distinguished by the excellence of the orchestra, the importance of the works performed, and the appearance of some of the greatest of the opera singers. All these attractive features are again put forward. The following programme will show what a good commencement of the new season has been made:—

PART I.

Overture, "Rosamunde"	...	...	..	...	...	Schubert.
Cavatina, "Della Rosa" (Bianca e Falierо)	...	...	...	...	...	Rossini.
Concerto, violin, No. 7	...	...	...	...	...	Spohr.
Aria, "In vane il fato" (Roberto)	...	...	...	...	...	Meyerbeer.
Symphony in F	...	...	...	...	...	Beethoven.

PART II.

Concerto in C minor, pianoforte	...	...	...	...	...	Beethoven.
Duo, "A figlia" (Maria Padilla)	...	..	...	...	...	Donizetti.
Solo, violin, "Le Trille du Diable"	...	...	...	...	...	Tartini.
Overture, "Les Abencérrages"	...	...	...	...	...	Cherubini.

Schubert's overture charmed, as it almost must, by its bright genial beauty. The last but one of Beethoven's symphonies was capitally played by the splendid orchestra over which Dr. Wylde presides with great enthusiasm—and the same may be said of both overtures. The Allegretto Scherzando of the symphonies was encored as usual. Spohr's seventh concerto is one of the finest of more than twenty such works. Like the pianoforte concertos of Mozart, Beethoven, and Mendelssohn; and violin concertos of the two last-named, those by Sophr have the importance of symphonies in design and treatment, while allowing ample scope for the display of expression and execution by the solo player. That the concerto referred to was played to perfection may be inferred from the name of the player—Herr Joachim, who was received with enthusiastic applause, the graceful slow movement calling forth a special demonstration. The fantastic piece which the great violinist of the last century is said to have heard in a dream, gave an opportunity for Herr Joachim to exhibit his facility in vanishing "impossibilities," as its difficulties were long considered to be. Beethoven's third concerto, worthy precursor of that in G and the unparalleled "Emperor" in E flat, the energy and rhythmical power of the player were displayed with his usual success. Vehement applause followed each movement, and especially the last. Madame Lemmens-Sherrington was heard to advantage in the airs of Rossini and Meyerbeer, which also and the public are so familiar; and Donizetti's duet was effectively given by the same singer and Miss José Sherrington.

NEW PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The second of the Soirées musicales given by the New Philharmonic Society took place on Thursday week, in St. George's Hall. The programme contained two novelties, viz.:—a violin quartet by a lady composer, Alice Mary Smith, and a solo for the violoncello, written and executed by M. Paque. The programme was as follows:—

PART I.

Quartet in A	...	...	...	...	...	Alice Mary Smith.
Song, "Sognai"	...	...	...	...	...	Schira.
Solo, violoncello	...	...	...	...	...	Paque.
Duet, "A Mirrath"	...	...	...	...	...	Handel.
Cantata, "Hear my prayer"	...	...	...	...	...	Mendelsohn.
Song, air "Des Bijoux"	...	...	...	...	...	Gounod.
Trio in G—pianoforte, Miss Grace Sherrington; violin, M. Pollitzer; violoncello, M. Paque.	...	...	...	...	...	Hummel.

PART II.

Quintet in C	...	...	...	...	...	Kalkbrenner.
Song, "He's gone"	...	...	...	...	...	Macfarren.
Solo, pianoforte—Miss Sherrington	...	...	...	...	...	Heller—Bach.
Part song, by the Choir	...	...	...	...	...	Mendelssohn.
Duet, two pianofortes—Miss Kingdon and Miss C. Kingdon						(Mendelssohn and Moscheles

The quartet is a work of merit. The subjects are well contrasted, melodious, and graceful, and are wrought with the hand of a musician. The work was listened to with much interest. The interpretation over much to M. Pollitzer, one of the best violinists of the day, and his able coadjutors, Messrs. Wiener, Hann, and Paque.

The solo for the violoncello is one of the many pieces which M. Paque has written for his instrument. In touch, style, and expressive delivery of phrase, Miss Sherrington is accomplished. Her performance was altogether highly successful. Dr. Barth also showed his command over the pianoforte.

The charming voice of Miss Katherine Poynte was heard to advantage in Signor Schira's "Sognai." The duet singing of Miss Sinclair and Miss Emma Forbes told with good effect. Miss Forbes was encored in Macfarren's song. The choir performed Mendelssohn's "Hear my prayer," with excellent effect, Miss Poynte singing the solos. Mr. W. Beetson conducted the choir.

The soirée concluded with the grand duet for two pianofortes arranged by Mendelssohn and Moscheles. It served to display the fine pianoforte playing of the Misses Kingdon, whose performances were much applauded. The vocal music was accompanied by Herr Ganz with his usual ability. Mr. T. H. Wright was the director of the evening.

ST. PETERSBURGH.—After singing at upwards of thirty concerts in England, Scotland, and Ireland, Herr Stockhausen will shortly sing in this capital at three historical concerts.

BUDAPEST.—Les Ronsonilles, an original two-act opera, founded upon a Russian legend, has been successfully produced at the Théâtre de la Monnaie. The audience on the first night were in the most amiable of humours, applauding everything—music, libretto, scenery, actors, and orchestra; and, when the stage-manager announced the name of the fair author, at the conclusion of the piece, greeting it enthusiastically, as though they were taken by surprise, and had not been previously aware that the novelty was composed by the Baroness de Maistre.

PROVINCIAL.

LEWES.—A correspondent writes from this town as below:—

"Mrs. John Macfarren gave one of her popular pianoforte and vocal recitals on Thursday, March 10th, at the New Lecture Hall in West Street. There was a large attendance, and Mrs. Macfarren's playing of a sonata of Beethoven, and several brilliant pieces by Dussek, Weber, Thalberg, Litolff, &c., was warmly appreciated. She was much applauded throughout the evening, and repeated a portion of Brissac's fantasia, 'Scotia.' Miss Jessie Royd gave several songs, in three of which she was encored."

BRIGHTON.—A correspondent writes as follows:—

"The concert at the Royal Pavilion, under the conductorship of Mr. C. J. Bond, in aid of the Boys' Brigade and Night School, was more successful in a musical than in a pecuniary point of view. A number of amateurs and a few professional singers gave their assistance. Among them was a daughter of Mr. Thomas Harper, the eminent trumpet player, who made her first appearance. She has a good voice, and sings extremely well. The Brighton Glee and Madrigal Union sang part-songs. Mr. Bond played pianoforte solos, including his own fantasia on "God Save the Queen;" Mr. Harper, the "Ave Maria" of Schubert; and "The Soldier tired," on the trumpet. Messrs. Potts & Co. kindly gave the use of a grand pianoforte, and superintended the general arrangements.

EDINBURGH.—The annual concert of the University Musical Society was held in the Music Hall on Friday week. There was, as on former occasions, a chorus of past and present students, numbering about sixty; and the orchestra, amounting to about fifty, consisted of amateurs, chiefly from the St. Cecilia Society, with an infusion of the professional element—and of wind instruments from the band of the 17th Lancers, the conductor being Mr. Adam Hamilton. There was a large attendance, and the hall looked its best, being decorated with evergreens and busts of distinguished musicians.

LEEDS.—The following is from a correspondent:—

"The Gye-Mapleson troupe put in an appearance here last Friday and Saturday, on their way from Edinburgh, and gave Il Trovatore on the first evening, and Don Giovanni the second evening. Notwithstanding the season of Lent, and the number of our upper thousand who object to support "amusements" during the forty days and forty nights, there was on each occasion a very large and brilliant assemblage. Enthusiasm prevailed each evening—especially with the Trovatore. Herr Wachtel was Manrico; Mdlle. Tietjens, Leonora; Mdme. Scalchi, Azucena. Signor Bevignani was the conductor. In Don Giovanni the Leporello was Herr Formes.—On Thursday, the 17th, Mr. Halle, Herr Joachim, Sig. Piatti, and Miss Edith Wynne gave a concert at the Town Hall, which was moderately well attended. The King of Violinists carried all before him by his playing exciting the audience to enthusiasm. Mr. Halle's concerts have not paid in Leeds this season, and the local papers state that Mr. Walker Joy's long purse has been drawn upon for the deficiency so much, that the concerts are to be abandoned. Still, it would appear that Mr. Archibald Ramsden, the musicseller, is willing to risk his money in trying Halle and his band once more; and, from what I can gather, there will be other orchestral concerts given by local musical celebrities, who will contest the position with Messrs. Halle and Isaacs. Messrs. Spark and Barker are giving some Lent oratorios at the Town Hall on Saturday evening. The Creation led the way, and, on the whole, was exceedingly well given. I hear that Elijah is the next on the list. With the choruses sung by the Madrigal and Motet Society, and some good principals, there is every reason to hope that this sublime work will be performed in a manner worthy of the music, and of the town in which it is to be produced.—G. T."

BIRMINGHAM.—The Midland Counties Herald contains the following notice of a recent concert:—

"The last of those pleasant musical meetings got up by Mr. Anderton under the title of the 'Birmingham Sub-scription Orchestral Concerts,' was given at the new Masonic Hall, on the afternoon of Saturday last, and, notwithstanding the non-appearance of Miss Edith Wynne, went off very satisfactorily. Mr. Anderton, on the receipt of the telegram communicating the impossibility of Miss Wynne's appearance, immediately took steps to remedy the mishap, and succeeded in securing the services of Mr. Horace Insull, a young musician of rising talent, who has recently returned from foreign study. The performances commenced with Weber's overture to Euryanthe. To place of S-hubert's song, 'The mighty trees bend,' Mr. Insull sang Mozart's 'In diesen heiligen Hallen" from Zauberflote, and gave it in a manner that indicated much promise. This gentleman afterwards gave 'The Mill Wheel,' and also a German air, new to us, concluding with Gounod's 'Nazareth.' Mr. Insull appears likely to become a welcome addition to our local vocalists. Mr. C. J. Duchemin played a concerto by Beethoven so finely as to make us regret that he does not appear more often. Haydn's symphony, loosely termed 'The departure,' from the way in which the members of the orchestra leave their places by degrees as the last movement is being closed, caused more merriment than perhaps was intended by the composer. Nicolai's overture, The Merry Wives of Windsor, opened the second part. The piece on the whole was well played. Mr. F. Ward, jun., a young native violinist of much promise, then gave a Notturno, with orchestral accompaniments, by Wallace, with more genuine execution than obtrusiveness of manner. We are glad to observe—thanks to Herr Joachim and Madame Neruda—that the ultra-demonstrative style of playing is on the wane; and that difficulties are no longer considered as of necessity to be wriggled out and produced under contortion. Mr. Ward was, as he deserved to be, well received. The performance was concluded by a selection from Mosè in Egitto, arranged by Mr. Humphreys, with that tact for giving solos for the best points of his best players which appears to be his peculiar forte; and advantage was well taken of the circumstance by Messrs. Gilmer, Bell, Roxbee, and others. Mr. Anderton conducted with his usual skill."

EARL DUDLEY'S OFFER.

To the Editor of "Berrow's Worcester Journal."

DEAR SIR,—Although I agree with you and the press generally as to the importance and decisive character of the public meeting held at the Guildhall, on Saturday, the 5th inst., and rejoice that the county and city representatives there assembled expressed themselves so emphatically in favour of continuing the Festivals as heretofore, yet I cannot help thinking that it did not go far enough; inasmuch as it offered the Dean and Chapter no assistance touching the money difficulty, nor any suggestion as to how these glorious meetings could be positively secured to us for the future.

It is said that the noble Earl who has offered the £10,000 will, if Worcester reject it, make the same offer to Gloucester and Hereford. Now, as it appears to me that it would be equally fatal to our Festivals should the Dean and Chapter of either of the Cathedrals accept the gift, I would respectfully suggest that a conference of the several Deans and Chapters take place, and that they give a guarantee to each other to refuse the amount offered; and should Gloucester or Hereford fail to give this guarantee, I should certainly accept the £10,000 on behalf of Worcester. Some may object to this as savouring somewhat of coercion. This, however, I cannot admit, looking to the fact that the interests of the three counties are identical in this matter, and that the money is offered by a nobleman of our own county. Let us consider for a moment how pitiable will be our position supposing we refuse the noble gift of £10,000 to save our Festival meetings, and then Hereford or Gloucester accept the money, and be the means of breaking up that which we were anxious to consolidate, and enrich themselves with the amount which we might have had, without bringing about a more fatal result.

Had the Town Council listened to Mr. Alderman Webb's remarks at their last meeting, I should then have offered this suggestion. I could not, however, venture to do so after their peremptory decision upon the subject. Will you, therefore, kindly allow me to satisfy myself in this way by using your columns, as I should be exceedingly sorry to lose both the music and the money.

Sincerely hoping that these grand old Festivals will be continued to us in all their power and beauty, I am, dear Sir, yours faithfully,

CITIZEN.

Worcester, March 17th.

MADAME PAREPA-ROSA.

We read in an American paper, The Press, of February 28th, the following account of this popular vocalist:—

"The Parepa-Rosa Opera Company will appear in this city, at the Academy of Music, March 8 and 9. Martha and Von Weber's Oberon, will be given. Oberon is an opera we believe totally unknown, except through the pianoforte score, to the American public. It will be produced in Philadelphia for the first time in America. It is one of Weber's three great operas, the others being Euryanthe and the universally popular Der Freischutz. Mr. Rosa, now one of the best of orchestra directors, is to wield the bâton. We shall look forward with most agreeable anticipation to the production of Oberon, which promises to make an epoch in our artistic history. While prudently consulting all tastes, the Rosas have, from the very commencement of their managerial career, exhibited a most laudable desire to do honour to the highest order of musical art. Thus, besides such ephemeral productions as Martha, the Bohemian Girl, &c., they have already given two monumental works—one in the classic, and the other in the romantic school, namely, Mozart's Marriage of Figaro and Weber's Der Freischütz, each a masterpiece in its way, the former being, moreover, a quasi novelty to the American public. The splendid success which has attended the performances of these undying efforts of genius all over the States has doubtless encouraged the Rosas to proceed still further in the right direction."

LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 26, 1870.

MOSCHELES.*

ANOTHER of the great musical celebrities whom Leipsic proudly called her own has passed from among us, and the loss will be deeply felt, not only here but everywhere else. On the morning of the 10th March, the sad news ran through the town with the speed of lightning, that, at a quarter past 2 A.M., Professor Ignatius Moscheles had gently and quietly expired.

Though he was very old—having nearly completed his 76th year—and had been ailing the entire winter, the noble-minded master seemed to have happily got over the last serious attack. A few days previous to his decease, he was seen in the concert-room and in the theatre, where the production of new works always greatly interested him, for the warmest sympathy with all artists and all matters connected with art, was one of the many amiable and rare qualities which distinguished him, even at his advanced age. But a sudden relapse again flung him on a bed of sickness, and, a few days later, a pulmonary attack put an end to his existence.—Let us cast a hasty retrospective glance on the career, so fertile in beneficial results, a career which the honoured master pursued with undiminished intellectual power to the very last—a career of fame, prosperity, and peace.

Ignatius Moscheles was born on the 30th March, 1794, at Prague, where his father was an Israelitish tradesman. His musical talent manifested itself at so early an age, that his father, a careful man, soon made him take lessons, first from Zahbradka, a Bohemian, and then from Hozelsky. When the boy was ten, he was fit for the Prague Conservatory, of which the celebrated director, Dionys Weber, instructed him from 1804 to 1808, with such good results that the young phenomenon was able to appear in public by 1806, exciting universal astonishment, both by his virtuoso-like, fiery pianoforte-playing, and his successful essays in composition. It was determined that he should be sent to Vienna (1808), in order that he might there complete his musical education.

As a boy of fourteen, Moscheles enjoyed the advantage of instruction, at Vienna, first from Albrechtsberger and afterwards from Salieri. The result was most astounding. The very next year (1809) he played at a concert in Vienna with great success. Salieri took a warm interest in him, and afterwards appointed him his deputy for three years at the Kärnthnerthor-Theater, thus exempting him at the same time from the military conscription. The young virtuoso's talent developed itself so quickly and brilliantly that he soon became one of the favourites of the Vienna public, and the centre of all matters connected with concerts, though Hummel (who left Vienna in 1816) was then shining as a star of the first magnitude, and young Meyerbeer exciting great sensation as a pianist. But it was this very rivalry which impelled Moscheles to keep raising himself higher and higher. At the age of two-and-twenty he was the most popular pianoforte teacher and virtuoso, besides displaying indefatigable industry as a composer; his extemporaneous performances on the piano were celebrated even then. "The public," Hanslick tells us, in Moscheles's own words, "rushed forward, with open arms, to receive and welcome the virtuoso; for bravura pieces at that period were something new." During the Congress of Vienna (1815), Moscheles played, for the first time, his most brilliant effort as a virtuoso, namely, his "Variations, with Orchestra, on Alexander's March," a piece that afterwards became so celebrated. In 1817 he gave concerts with the very popular guitarist, Giuliani, and, in 1818, with Mayseder, both these artists having previously played with Hummel. Moscheles earned no less applause and honour than his celebrated predecessor.

As far back as 1816 Moscheles made his first professional tour through Germany, everywhere exciting admiration by his eminent virtuosity, as well as by the elegance and dash of his style. During another tour, undertaken in 1820, he visited Holland, France, and England, meeting with so brilliant a reception that, in 1821, he settled in London. It is from the time of his sojourn in England that his European celebrity commenced. It was in England, too, that he entered upon the full maturity of his productive powers, powers which soon obtained for him a name as celebrated in the character of a composer for the piano as in that of a performer on it. He did not return to Germany before 1823. He visited his birthplace, as well as Munich, Dresden, Leipsic, Berlin, Hamburgh, etc., and in Vienna achieved even greater triumphs than ever. He came forth the decided conqueror from a contest with Kalkbrenner. The public acknowledged, unhesitatingly, that there was a profounder purport in Moscheles's compositions, and something more imposing in his style; with all his smoothness and bravura, Kalkbrenner was superficial. Moscheles's extemporaneous performances, too, performances in which he displayed such unusual brilliancy, far surpassed those of Kalkbrenner. Moscheles and Hummel were, at that period, acknowledged unconditionally as the most effective composers for the piano, and the most sterling virtuosos since the time of Mozart and Beethoven; with them there began a new period of pianoforte playing.

After his return to London (1824), Moscheles received all the honours which the English love to bestow upon their favourites. He was appointed Professor at the Royal Academy of Music (1825), and a Director of the Philharmonic Concerts; he was the most fashionable master among the aristocracy, and the most popular pianist, while his co-operation was as eagerly sought for the concerts of others, as his own were invariably numerously attended. For the cultivation and propagation of classical music, as well as for the elevation of musical taste generally, Moscheles did a great deal in England, for he did not confine his efforts to London alone, but visited the provincial towns, as well as Scotland and Ireland.

It was at this period that young Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, during his tour through England, studied under Moscheles, who soon became his most intimate friend. Mendelssohn's letters mention this in a most charming manner. The fact of Mendelssohn's removing to Leipsic was the primary cause of Moscheles coming here on a visit, and, among other things, giving a concert with Mendelssohn, when the two masters played Moscheles's "Hommage à Handel," together, an event of which Schumann wrote so enthusiastic an account.

This bond of friendship between the two artists assumed great and lasting significance when Mendelssohn, after the establishment of the Leipsic Conservatory, prevailed on Moscheles to migrate to Leipsic, and accept the post of first professor of the piano. This was in 1846, and must have been of all the greater importance for the prosperity and reputation of the newly founded institution, from the fact that Mendelssohn was unfortunately taken from us the very next year. Moscheles's celebrated name attracted a large number of pupils from far and near, especially from England and America. The noble-minded master was indefatigable in precept and example; in the encouragement of young students of talent; and in the never varying kindliness with which he gave his opinion on their productions; he was a model of punctuality and unflagging zeal in the discharge of his professional duties, while his mental freshness and bodily vigour were so rare that he continued to figure successfully as a virtuoso and composer up to a very advanced period of his life. While, on the one hand, he knew how to maintain, with undiminished strength, the classical traditions of the grand period to which his youth belonged, he advanced, on the other, in a most extraordinary manner, with his own times, taking an interest in everything new and important, and being always kind and just in his opinion of others.

It was not alone as a pianist and a teacher, but as a composer likewise, that Moscheles rendered lasting service to art. As virtuosity with him, was not the final object, but simply the artistic means, his compositions bear the sterling stamp of classical form and artistic earnestness, and, even in the higher solo style, always exhibit delicate and interesting touches. His Etudes are justly considered classical models of indisputable value. Of his eight "Concertos for the Piano and Orchestra," that in G minor is the most celebrated. From the long list of his other works (the Opus No. of those published goes up to 142), we would especially select the "Sonate mélancolique;" the Trio, Op. 84; the Sextet, Op. 35; the Septet, Op. 88; the "Hommage à 'Handel," for two Pianos; the "Sonata for four Hands," Op. 47; and the "Sonata for Pianoforte and Violoncello," Op. 121. Moscheles wrote for the orchestra several symphonies and two overtures, (those to The Jungfrau von Orleans, and to the ballet, Die Portraits). As an author, too, he proved his cleverness; he wrote, among other things, an English biography of Beethoven, in which he alinded to his own connection with that master, who entertained a high personal regard for him as the interpreter of his works. Moscheles added, moreover, a collection of original letters.

It is said that Moscheles has written an autobiography, which will most certainly be published. The deceased master was in the laudable habit of keeping a very exact diary, and this will doubtless furnish a rich store of materials for the special history of music.—His name will live honourably in the history of art; his portrait will never be effaced from the memory of any one who knew him. MADAME ARABELLA GODDARD has made arrangements for a tour in Germany, to begin next August and to last till May, 1871—so that, after the present season, she may not be heard in England for a very long time. The season following she contemplates a similar tour in France. Happily, we shall have no lack of pianists while Herr Hallé, Herr Pauer, Frau Schumann, Herr Coenen, Herr Kuhe, Fraulein Zimmermann, and other distinguished German artists, are within call. We are encouraged by what we hear to believe that Madame Goddard, who, as Miss Arabella Goddard, years since, was so cordially welcomed, all over Germany, will meet with a reception no less hearty than before. All the great societies of the Continent are eager to avail themselves of her services. England will lose a pianist; Germany and France will gain one.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

In another part of this impression will be found some specimens of the cloud of stories which always herald Madame Patti's return from St. Petersburgh to Western Europe. In one she is made to receive presents of fabulous value; in another to find a wonderful echo of herself in the shape of a little girl, who, of course, is sent to the Conservatoire (the inventor should be careful); this tale was told long ago of Madame Alboni); and, in another, to narrowly escape death in the railway train. We suppose that flying kites of this sort serve the flier's purpose; but the kites themselves deceive nobody blessed with perceptive powers. As regards the St. Petersburgh presents, our wonder is that Madame Patti ever tears herself away from the northern Golconda, in order to sojourn in our own sterile regions, where there are no diamonds and pearls given away, where the orchestra cannot afford to subscribe golden crowns, and where three "rappels" are all that the most demonstrative audience can find the heart, or the hands, or the lungs, to bestow.

WE have received from America a mad paper called The Train Extra, evidently edited in a lunatic asylum, and certainly full of George Francis Train. G. F. T. (who failed to make tramways in London, but succeeded in penetrating an Irish jail), is now raving all over the States against England, crying "Havoc" and "Let slip the dogs of war" (terms, a clear half the net proceeds—vide advertisement). Let him rave, but let him not trouble us with his diatribes. We have enough to do with Herr Wagner; and cannot afford to meddle with George Francis Train.

VANCE the Great, gave a concert in St. James's Hall, on Tuesday evening, assisted by the élite of his peculiar profession, and by several grooms who sold programmes. The place was crammed to suffocation by all sorts of people, from dignified folk, who never smiled, to folk undignified who joined in the choruses. What went they out to see and hear? Buffoonery of the lowest order; singing (Heaven save the mark!) than which as good might be heard in the street any day; comic men without an atom of humour; and women who made an exhibition of themselves which we forbear to characterize. The whole affair was inexpressibly saddening; to those who believe in an improved public taste, inexpressibly disappointing.

YOUNG Germany had an innings on Tuesday evening, under the auspices of Herr Coenen. Seldom does Young Germany get such a chance in uncongenial old England. True, it flourishes a little under the glass roof at Sydenham, but the process there is a forcing one, like that which goes on under glass roofs generally. On Tuesday, Young Germany had a fair field and no favour. With what results? Weariness in the first place; further than which we need not go. Herr Raff's trio in G wearied; Herr Max Bruch's quartet wearied; and Herr Grädcer's quintet wearied. There may have been degrees of badness, but all were bad—a very Sahara of musical sterility, "a dry and thirsty land, wherein was no water." And this is Young Germany! From it may Heaven protect us.

THROUGH the kindness of Mr. Alberto Randegger we are enabled to quote as follows from a letter written by Herr Ferdinand Hiller, àpropos of the approaching Beethoven fête at Bonn:—

"Maintenant je vous dirai encore que la notice sur Wagner, quant au Beethoven Festival, est complétement fausse. J'ai été dû unanimement pour le diriger, et j'ai accepté, quoique cela me force de revenir de suite après Birmingham. La fête aura lieu (avec les répétitions), depuis le 9 jusqu'au 14 Septembre."

This settles, authoratively, certain doubtful questions.

WE respectfully salute the Dean and Chapter of Hereford. Earl Dudley has made known to the world that, should the Dean and Chapter of Worcester decline his £10,000 (with the conditions attached), he will make a like offer to the dignitaries of Gloucester and Hereford. The pious Earl need not trouble Hereford, if we may judge by the fact that, not content with permitting the Festival of 1870 to be held in their Cathedral, the Dean and Chapter have permitted the use of the building for a sacred evening concert on the opening day. Once more we respectfully salute the Dean and Chapter.

HERR R. WAGNER will not, after all, direct the Beethoven Festival, at Bonn; so, once more, have Virgil's celebrated lines, beginning, "Fama, malum quo, non aliud velocius ullum," been triumphantly verified. The report, so industriously circulated, that the Committee had selected the chief Prophet of the Future to preside over the festival about to be got up in honour of the great composer of Fidelio, turns out to be nothing more than a delusion, a mockery, and a snare. The Committee have unanimously selected Herr Ferdinand Hiller to the important post. Dr. Hiller will be assisted by the Town-Musical-Director, Herr von Wasilewski.

MOSCHELES'S funeral took place at Leipsic on the 13th inst., and was attended by an extraordinary number of his friends, admirers, and pupils. It was preceded by a service in the house of mourning. The Revs. Herreo Ahlfeld and Valentiner delivered impressive discourses in memory of the Deceased, while the students of the Conservatory, under the direction of Herr Reiocke, sang two choruses by Mendelssohn, and a Requiem by Herr Levi, conductor at Carlsruhe. On the previous evening, the University Vocal Association of the Pauliner had sang choruses by Heidelsohn and Gellus, round the coffin, which was magnificently decorated with laurels and palms. At the funeral, the Town Council, the Committee of the Gewandhaus, several local Associations, etc., were represented by delegates. All the Professors and Students of the Conservatory, headed by their director, Herr Schleinitz, attended the ceremony. The procession was opened by the pupils of the Deceased carrying two silver laurel-wreaths, presented by the Conservatory and Muller's School of Music, palm-branches, and garlands of flowers. At the grave, the Thomaner Choir sang something appropriate, and the Rev. Herr Ahlfeld pronounced the benediction over the coffin. A separate musical funereal ceremony was shortly to be performed at the Conservatory.

MENDELSSOHN AND STERNDALE BENNETT.

(From the "Sunday Times," March 20.)

Mendelssohn's Posthumous Studies were given for the second time at the Monday Popular Concert of the 14th inst., and for the second time their great difficulty was partially hidden by the ease with which Madame Goddard played them. Which she played best would be hard to say, all being given so well. As to which pleased most there can be no doubt. The moto continuo of No. 2 (in F) makes it a work of genuine attraction, and it was executed with a brilliancy and precision entirely remarkable. No such playing has been heard in St. James's Hall of late, and the audience, one not disposed to wax enthusiastic about English artists on slight provocation, recalled Madame Goddard that she might play again. Dr. Bennett's trio was heard for the third time at these concerts, but never before, it may safely be said, was the beauty of the work made so clear. The performance by Madame Goddard, Herr Joachim, and Signor Piatti, was unique, each artist seeming to feel that association with the other two demanded a special effort. Hence the result We should like to discuss the music as it deserves, but neither time nor space allows. This must be said, however, that the serenade wherein pizzicato strings accompany a beautiful theme for piano, belongs to the highest order of creative art, and alone would demand for the trio the admiration of every connoisseur.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

THE last Monthly Popular Concert of the season took place at the Angell Town Institution, Brixton, on Thursday, the 12th inst. The quintet in A major, of Mozart, for clarionet, two violins, viola, and violoncello, by Messrs. Lazarus, Henry Blagrove, F. Ralph, Richard Blagrove, and W. H. Aylward, was well done, and the clarionet obbligato by Mr. Lazarus encored. The sonata of Woelfl, Ne Plus Ultra, in F major, for pianoforte, and two of Mendelssohn's Lieder ohne Worte were thoroughly well performed by Mr. R. Prentice. The quintet in E flat, of Schumann, Op. 44, for pianoforte, two violins, viola, and violoncello, by Messrs. Ridley Prentice, Henry Blagrove, F. Ralph, Richard Blagrove, and W. H. Aylward, brought the concert to a satisfactory conclusion. The vocalists were Miss Poole and Miss Alice Ryall. The crowded audience frequently expressed approval of the excellence of the programme, which reflected credit on the director, Mr. R. Prentice.—On the evening previous the Brixton Amateurs gave their fifth concert, the feature of the programme being Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony. —W. H. P.

MR. GREENHILL'S concert at the Beethoven Rooms attracted a fair audience. Mr. Greenhill, with a nice voice and good method, sang two solos, and took part in various concerted pieces (one of them, "Oh! whisper but the gentle word," composed by himself). Mr. Greenhill was well supported (especially in Mozart's "Sento O Dio") by Miss Robertine Henderson, Miss Fanny Chatfield, Mr. Bushelle, and Mr. Miles Bennett. Miss Robertine Henderson sang Randegger's "Only be one," and was called upon to repeat it. Miss Maria Severn and Mdme. Emmeline Cole—the former in "Cangio d'aspetto," and the latter in "Non so piu cosa," were also applauded. The concert gave altogether general satisfaction. Signori Randegger and Fiori were the conductors.

THE Barnsbury Choral Association gave a concert at Barnsbury Hall (Islington), on the 18th inst. The members of the association must have felt highly flattered by the attendance of so large a number of their friends, who filled the room, and rewarded the performers with great applause, and "encores" innumerable. The programme is too long to mention in detail, but the names of those who took part in it were—Miss Lizzie Horsey, Miss M'Quire, Miss M'Danell, Miss Rosabella Shackell, Miss Lundie, Messrs. Denvall, Raven, M'Danell, Storey, Adams, and Master Brown, vocalists; Miss Giles, Miss Gerard, and Miss Saunders, pianists; and Mr. Edward Jeffs, flute. There are a few songs that deserve to be particularly named as being given with more than "amateur" ability; these were Blumenthal's "The Message" (Mr. Denvall), Molloy's "Clochette" (Miss M'Quire), Signor Mattei's "Non è ver" (Miss Shackell), and Balfe's "Twas rank and fame" (Mr.

M'Dunell)—all redemanded and repeated. Among the pianoforte solos were Herr Gaul's "Qui Vive Galop," brilliantly played by Miss Giles, and Mr. Bache's "L'Irresistible" by Miss Saunders (encored). A flute solo, played by Mr. Edward Jeffs, was one of the "successes" of the evening. It was an effective arrangement by Mr. Forde of Mr. Rodwell's popular song, "Charming May," and was brilliantly executed by Mr. Jeffs, who possesses a charming tone combined with taste and expression. Mr. Jeffs was called upon to repeat the pieces by the unanimous desire of the audience. The part-singing of the choir was exceedingly good, especially in "The Bells of St. Michael's Tower." Mr. Raven was the conductor, and Mr. Sharpe the accompanist.

THE second of Madame Berger-Lascelles' amateur performances took place on Saturday evening at her residence, and attracted a large concourse of friends and pupils. The first part of the programme was selected from the two Messes Solennelles of Gounod and Rossini, and The Prodigal Son, which were given with admirable effect, Madame Berger's voice telling with much effect in the "Agnus Dei" of Rossini. The second part was a secular selection from the works of Mendelssohn, Wallace, Rossini, Balfe, F. Berger, and Nuendevyer, all of which were given with much effect. Mr. Francesco Berger was the accompanist.

MR. AGUILAR'S Soirée d'invitation took place, on Thursday last, at 17, Gloucester Crescent, Hyde Park. The following was the programme:—Solo piano, Caprice in D flat, Aguilar; Song, "Jewel song" (Faust), Gounod—Miss Annie Sinclair; Song, "Dieu, que ma voix" (La Juive), Halévy—Mr. Trelawny Cobham; Solo piano, Fantasia on two Russian Airs, Thalberg—Miss Miss Bourchier (pupil of Mr. Aguilar); Romanza, "Come placida ruginda," Aguilar—Signor Chiatti; Duetto, "Da quel dì" (Linda), Donizetti—Miss Annie Sinclair and Mr. Trelawny Cobham; Solo violin, Romanza in F, Beethoven—Herr Deichman; Song, "O vago fior," Marra—Miss Goodall; Song, "Apprenticed," Aguilar—Mr. Trelawny Cobham; Solo piano, Esmeralda (morceau caractéristique), Aguilar—Mr. Aguilar; Songs, "The Flood," "The Post," Schubert—Miss Annie Sinclair; Duo, violin and piano (Les Huguenots), De Beriot and Thalberg—Herr Deichman and Mr. Aguilar; Song, "The Lady of the Lea," Henry Smart—Miss Chiatti; Solo piano, Coulenr de Rose (galop brillant), Aguilar—Mr. Aguilar. Miss Grace Aguilar presided at the pianoforte.

MR. F. W. BATES (R.A.M.), formerly a pupil of Mr. W. H. Holmes and the late Professor Bisehoff, gave a concert at the Assembly Rooms, Woodford, on Thursday, February 17th. We append the programme, and congratulate Mr. Bates on the success he obtained for his several performances:—Quartet, Beethoven—Messrs. F. W. Bates, Blagrove, R. Blagrove, and Aylward; Cavatina, "Qui la voce" (I Puritani)—Mdlle. Florence Lancia; Andante and Allegro Vivace, violin, Mendelssohn—Mr. Blagrove; Scena, "The Wreck of the Hesperus," Hatton—Mr. Harley Visning; Song, "Birds were telling one another," H. Smart—Miss Julia Sydney; Duet, "Think a Sailor is faithful" (Gazzaloni), Balfe—Mdlle. F. Lancia and Mr. Harley Visning; Variations on "God save the Emperor," Haydn—Messrs. Blagrove, Gibson, R. Blagrove, and Aylward; Song, "The Vagabond," Molloy—Mr. Harley Visning; Song, "Good-night, sweet Mother," Diodonate—Mdlle. Florence Lancia; Concerto, C major, pianoforte (quintet accompaniments), Beethoven—Mr. F. W. Bates; Duet, "The Cousins," S. Glover—Mdlle. F. Lancia and Miss Julia Sydney; Ballad, "Cherry ripe," Horn—Mdlle. Florence Lancia; Minuet and trio, Sextet, Mozart.

AN Irish concert on St. Patrick's day may be accounted a success before the event for reasons it is not necessary to state. It will, therefore, be taken for granted that St. James's Hall was crowded on Thursday evening, when Miss Berry-Greening offered the public a long succession of familiar and favourite Irish ballads. Equally, as a matter of course, the audience was demonstrative, and applause the order of the evening. The principal artists, in addition to the concert-giver (a special favourite), were Madame Rudersdorff, Miss Angèle, the Sisters Doria, Mr. G. Perren, Mr. Wilms, Herr Carl Stepan, and Mr. Brinley Richards. No purpose would be served by entering at length into what was done. Enough if we mention that, judging by the applause, everything conferred pleasure. Mr. Richards played a new fantasia on Irish airs composed by himself, and won an encore—which was no resisting. A Miss Amy Wheelhouse also played a pianoforte solo on Irish airs with great brilliancy and a deservedly similar result. Mr. Howard Reynolds gave a cornet solo, and the Concert Glee Union contributed several things from its repertory. Mr. J. L. Hatton was conductor.

A MUSICAL SOIREE was given on Wednesday evening at the Norfolk Road Musical Academy, Bayswater, under the direction of Mr. Lansdowne Cottell. The programme consisted of both popular and classical works, vocal and instrumental. Some admirable pieces selected from the compositions of Ascher, Beethoven, Benedict, Weber, &c., were played by the Mesdames J. Searle, Janinska, S. Evans, A. Price, L. Vignette, Mardoni, and C. M. Weber. Miss L. Dwright and Mdlle. Elise in "Giorno d'Orrore" displayed their fresh voices to great advantage; the latter, in "Why breathe that sigh," sang with much feeling; as did Miss E. Lingley and Miss M. Christine in "The Maiden" and "Away from dear Erin"; both were loudly applauded. Mr. C. J. Bishenden gave "Dear to my soul thou art," and was encored. He sang it remarkably well. A Mr. J. H. Sutcliffe, who has lately being singing with Lister's operatic troupe at the Antipodes, gave a song from Faust, with excellent effect. The whole performance gave much satisfaction. Mr. L. Cottell and Mr. C. M. Weber were accompanists.

THE last meeting for the season of the Round, Catch and Canon Club was held on Saturday evening, at Willis's Rooms under the able presidency of Mr. Serjeant Sargood. One hundred gentlemen sat down to an excellent banquet, and on the removal of the cloth 110 ladies occupied sofas at the end of the ball-room, to listen to the exquisite selections of glees, &c., provided for their entertainment. On the 5th inst. two prizes, of the value of 10*l.* and 5*l.* were competed for by the professional members, and were awarded to Mr. Winn and Mr. Coates. These compositions were sung again on Saturday, and gave much pleasure to the company. Most of our choicest part-music has been brought into existence through the encouragement of prizes given by the several musical societies, and in this instance five glees, all of great merit, have been produced. The professional members of the club are Mr. Francis, Mr. Baxter, Mr. Burnby, Mr. Coates, Mr. Lond, Mr. Walker, Mr. Gear, Mr. Bradbury, Mr. Winn, and Mr. Lawler. Between the first and second parts the ladies sat down to an elegant collation. The toast of "The Officers of the Club: Mr. Bradbury (treasurer), Mr. Baxter (librarian), and Mr. Francis (hon. sec.)," which was acknowledged by the last-named gentleman, concluded a most delightful treat.

The Beethoven fêtes, which are to take place at Bonn in August, will be under the direction of Herr F. Hiller and M. Wasilewsky; not of Herr Wagner, as some have stated.

M. Félix Clément has been promoted by the Pope, from the rank of Chevalier to that of Commander of the Order of St. Gregory the Great.

La Ménestrel says that Mr. Strange, of the Alhambra, has taken the Paris Folies-Bergères, with a view to reproducing the characteristics of his London establishment in the French capital.

At a late fashionable wedding, the bridal party being a little dilatory, the organist played "Eager to meet thee, love;" and again, the party not coming, he sounded forth "Robin's not here."

We learn that both Mr. Benedict's St. Peter and the work composed by Herr Hiller for the Birmingham Festival are to be published by Messrs. Novello, Ewer, & Co.

M. Strakosch's recently established musical journal, Le Télégraphe, has ceased to appear, pending arrangements for its issue as a daily paper. The experiment is a bold one, to say the least.

Mdlle. Sarolta, whom not a few of our readers will remember, has abandoned the Italian stage, and, now, plays Mephisto in Hervé's Petit Faust, at Cairo. Thus Italian opera loses, and opera bouffe gains, Mdlle. Sarolta.

Mr. Max Maretzek, having closed his not very successful season of Italian Opera in New York, is coming to Europe as the agent of Mr. James Fisk, jun.

The latest attempt at establishing French opera in New York has failed, and we are told by the Orpheoniet that its "last expiring kicks and squirms" have afforded great amusement.

It appears that Herr Wagner will not lecture at Berlin on "Music and the Drama." The Prophet wrote to the Royal Academy about the matter, and was frigidly told that he would not be opposed. So the Prophet will not have to shake the dust of Berlin from off his feet.

M. Thomas has made some changes in his Mignon for the Italian stage of Drury Lane. For example, the gavotte hitherto used as an entr'acte will be sung by Madame Trebelli in the second act. Le Ménestrel promises us a "galante surprise." We shall see.

The Stockholm Royal Academy of Music has just elected Mdlle. Sarah Helmze an honorary member. This distinction is shared by only two other ladies—Mdme. Lind-Goldschmidt and Mdme. Norman-Neruda. Has, then, Mdlle. Christine Nilsson refused it?

Robert le Diable has been produced at the Grand Opéra, and Donizetti's Regina di Golconda at the Italiens. Mdlle. Sessi's costume in the latter, designed by Gustave Doré and made by Worth, is said to have cost 5,000 francs.

Le Ménestrel pronounces the story of some recently discovered Proverbs by Haydn to be a pure invention. The pieces are by Audré, maître de chapelle to the Grand Duke of Hesse. Le Ménestrel, be it observed, was the first to publish the "invention."

The mania for new theatres in Paris and in London seems to be about the same. A new theatre, it is said, is about to be erected in Paris on the Boulevard Montmartre, on the site formerly occupied by the Café de Malhouse.

Mr. Shakespeare, R.A.M. (pupil of Mr. F. B. Jewson), is appointed organist to St. Marylebone Church. There were twenty-nine candidates, from whom the Vestry selected six. Two retired, leaving four (Messrs. Saunders, Forbes, Wingham, R.A.M., and Shakespeare) to compete. The Vestry selected the last-named gentleman.

According to La France Musicale, Herr Wachtel has much offended his Berlin admirers. Having obtained leave to fulfil an engagement with Messrs. Gye and Mapleson, he is reported to have left before his time, in order to sing at Magdeburg. Even if this story be true, which we doubt, the Berlinese ought to know that a tenor, not less than a prima donna, has the liberty of freak.

Herr Wagner's Meistersinger was received at Vienna with a tempest of mingled hisses and applause; such a tempest as has not been, we are assured, within living memory. The composer's friends attribute the Jews; just as they set down the affiets which greeted Tannhäuser in Paris, to the Jockey Club. It appears there are always some people who object to Future-music.

Cox and Box will be withdrawn at the Gallery of Illustration to-day after having been performed nearly 300 times. The novelty which will take its place on Monday is an adaptation from Offenbach, by F. C. Burnand, with the quaint title of Bogger my Neighbour; a Blindman's Bouffe, and in which Mr. German Reed and Mr. Arthur Cecil will appear.

Mr. John S. Clarke, the American comedian, sailed for New York on Saturday. He leaves behind him an excellent name. The parts in which he has appeared are few in number, but they enabled him to display a grotesque humour peculiarly his own; and, perhaps, no other actor for the last twelve months has caused so continuous a flow of mirth. Mr. John S. Clarke in The Toodles, like Mr. Sothern in the American Cousin, was one of the sights to be seen.

In answer to a correspondent who threw some doubts upon the authenticity of Mozart's forthcoming opera, L'Oca del Cairo, the subjoined letter was addressed to (and published in) the Daily Telegraph of Thursday, by Mr. Jarrett, acting manager to Mr. George Wood, at the Italian Opera, Drury Lane :—

"Sir,—If 'C. W. C.' refers to Dr. Ludwig Ritter von Köchel's Chronologisch-thematisches Verzeichniss sammtlicher Tonwerke W. A. Mozart's (pages 340, 341), and to the late Otto Jahn's famous biography of Mozart (vol. iv.), he will find all he requires to know about L'Oca del Cairo. True, the opera was abandoned by the composer, and left unfinished. What was wanting, however—viz., an overture and several pieces—was found to hand in another unfinished opera, Lo Sposo Deluso, and from this source the French adapter derived the materials to complete the work. Not a single piece is included in L'Oca del Cairo, about to be produced at the Italian Opera, Drury Lane, which is not the genuine composition of Mozart. Both L'Oca and Lo Sposo were composed in 1783, at Salsburg.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

H. JARRETT.

"March 22.

"P.S.—As 'C. W. C.' feels so interested about the Seraglio, he might have heard it in German about fifteen years ago (with Herr Formes as Osmin) at Drury Lane Theatre, or in Italian, very recently, at Her Majesty's Theatre, with Mdlle. Tietjens, Herr Ludansky, &c., in the chief characters."

The Surrey Theatre will witness the production on Easter-Monday, of a drama of a rather startling character. It is written by Mr. Charles H. Ross, editor of Judy, and is to astonish the South Londoners by the novelty of its construction, its effective dialogue, and dramatic mise-en-scène. The whole will be produced under the immediate supervision of the author.

The usual fabulous stories are told with respect to Madame Patti's benefit at St. Petersburgh. One declares her reception of an enormous pearl surrounded by thirty-one diamonds, the whole worth 70,000 francs. And another demands our belief in a laurel crown of massive gold, presented by the members of the orchestra. What lucky folk must be the members of an orchestra which can afford to give away crowns of massive gold!

Mdlle. Schneider commenced an engagement of twelve nights' duration on Monday night at Dublin, playing the part of the Grand Duchess to a crowded house. Her highness met with an enthusiastic reception and success, Cardinal Cullen's pastoral notwithstanding. A large congregation of students waiting at the stage door were very accommodative in their approval as Mdlle. Schneider left the theatre.

An entertainment was given by Mr. Thomas at the Manor Rooms, Hackney, on Friday week. The programme included Perfection; or, The Lady of Munster, in which Miss Blanche Owen, Mr. R. Pringle, and Mr. St. John Ingram, were commendable; Done on Both Sides, the original characters being sustained by Mrs. Thomas, Mr. Clare, Mr. Thomas, and Messrs. Pringle and Ingram. A miscellaneous concert was also given, Miss Owen, Mr. Thomas, Mr. Benwall, Mr. Bristo, Mr. Catchpole, and Mr. Cross, rendering a number of popular songs with taste. Mr. Thomas's "Watkin's Evening Party" was encored. Miss Lucy Thomas presided at the pianoforte.

At one of the latest representations of Faust, it is stated by a French journal that at the moment when Madame Patti finished one of her most brilliant morceaux, the famous singer heard an echo of wondrous potency issuing from the side scenes. Struck with the perfection of the imitation, Madame Patti was anxious to discover who was the singer, when, to her great astonishment, she found herself in the presence of a young girl nine years old, who now fixed longing eyes upon her model. The Marquise de Caux proposed to the parents to have the child instructed, but they refused to part with her, and then Madame Patti obtained her admission to the Conservatoire de Musique, at the cost of the State. Le Nord says that the little Marie Adler—for such is the name of Madame Patti's echo—will shortly give the people of St. Petersburgh an opportunity of hearing her voice at a concert.

Upon her return journey from St. Petersburgh, Madame Adelina Patti was in great danger of a tragical end. At the Prussian frontier the Marquis de Caux engaged a special saloon carriage, fitted with sleeping compartments, for the use of his party. The Marchioness had retired to rest, when in the middle of the night she was awoke by a sense of suffocation, and upon looking into the saloon of the carriage she found it filled with dense smoke. The stove which warmed the carriage had become overheated and set fire to the flooring. The whole of the party were at once awoke and applied their efforts to extinguish the fire, which had already extended to a sofa in the saloon. Their situation was most alarming, their means of checking the fire being but scanty; the train was an express, and there was no means of communicating with the guard or the engine driver. Happily, within a few minutes of the discovery, the train slackened speed on entering the station of Bromberg, when the danger was made known, and assistance was made to extinguish the fire.

On Tuesday evening week Mr. C. Dickens brought his readings at St. James's Hall to a close. "The trial from Pickwick" and "The Christmas Carol" were admirably read before a crowded assembly, who cheered long and repeatedly. At the finish Mr. Dickens, with emotion, said:—

"LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,—It would be worse than idle—for it would be hypocritical and unfeeling—if I were to disguise that I close this episode in my life with feelings of very considerable pain. For some fifteen years, in this hall and in many kindred places, I have had the honour of presenting my own cherished ideas before you for your recognition, and, in closely observing your reception of them, have enjoyed an amount of artistic delight and instruction which, perhaps, is given to few men to know. In this task, and in every other I have ever undertaken, as a faithful servant of the public, always imbued with a sense of duty to them, and always striving to do his best, I have been uniformly cheered by the readiest response, the most generous sympathy, and the most stimulating support. Nevertheless, I have thought it well, at the full, flood tide of your favour, to retire upon those older associations between us, which date from much further back than these, and henceforth to devote myself exclusively to the art that first brought us together. Ladies and gentlemen, in but two short weeks from this time I hope that you may enter, in your own houses, on a new 'Series of Readings,' at which my assistance will be indispensable; but from these garish lights I vanish now for evermore, with a heartfelt, grateful, respectful, and affectionate farewell."

Amidst repeated acclamations, whilst hats and handkerchiefs were waving in every part of the hall, the great novelist retired.

From the "MUSICAL WORLD."

"A patriotic appeal to Welshmen, by a Welshman. The song—which displays skill, as well as a knowledge of effect—is one of Mr. Richards' most vigorous efforts, and might have been written under the inspiration of 'The Men of Harlech.'"

From the "CARNARVON HERALD."

"With much pleasure we call attention to 'The Cambrian War Song,' one of the most effective compositions we have met with for some time past. The song might be termed a 'scena,' rather than 'a song,' as it is of a more ambitious and broader form of composition than that which is implied by the ordinary term of 'a song.'"

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

(From "the Saturday Review.")

The thirteenth series of Saturday Concerts at the Crystal Palace, now far advanced, has hitherto yielded in variety of interest to none of its predecessors. This we shall endeavour to show in a brief retrospect. Meanwhile, we may observe that the good these concerts have been the means of effecting, and the reputation they have conferred upon the Crystal Palace, as a place in which, during six or seven months in the year, one of the arts, at least, finds serious recognition, and honour in proportion, are generally acknowledged. It, therefore, behoves those in authority to extend every facility to the musical conductor, and to allow no obstacle to interfere with absolute efficiency. Many amateurs are doubtless grieved to see the time and labour of such a thorough disciplinarian as Mr. Manns, and such an admirably trained orchestra as his, employed, during a certain period of the year, in making music to the antics of harlequins and clowns, and, month after month, accompanying mediocre representations of what is politely called "English opera." Why not engage special performers for such entertainments? This would enable Mr. Manns to devote his energies exclusively to the good work which he was the first to originate, and which he has carried on for years with ability and well directed enthusiasm. The worst misfortune that could happen to the Crystal Palace would be the breaking up of an institution which has earned the name of "the Sydenham Philharmonic," and helped more than anything else to win the good opinion of those whose opinion is worth having. But this must sooner or later inevitably happen if the performances deteriorate; and how can they fail to deteriorate when obstacles like those to which we have referred are thrown in their way?

The concerts that preceded Christmas, in so far as related to the instrumental part, were almost uniformly good. As before, and as we trust and have little doubt will continue to be the custom, an orchestral symphony formed the solid attraction of almost every programme. Among the symphonies already familiar to the Crystal Palace, and about which there is little new to be said, were Nos. 1, 2, 5, and 7 of Beethoven (in C, D, C minor, and A); the so-called "Oxford Symphony" of Haydn (in G); Mendelssohn's Reformation; and Schumann's in D minor (No. 4—or more correctly speaking, No. 2). The earlier essays of Beethoven in this direction are by no means too frequently brought forward; but the C minor, if laid by for a while would come out again all the more vigorous and fresh. Not only at the concerts of the Crystal Palace but at several of the London orchestral concerts it has been heard of late; and if such a term may possibly apply to anything so noble, it runs the chance of becoming as "hackneyed" as the Kreutzer Sonata and the pianoforte trios of Mendelssohn, which, while few can play them as they should be played, every aspirant attempts. On the other hand the symphony in G—that dear old "Letter Q," as Thackeray would have said—composed for the concert at Oxford, in July, 1791, when the degree of Doctor in Music was conferred upon Haydn, might bear hearing much oftener. In former days this symphony was familiar—at least to those who had the privilege of attending the Philharmonic Concerts, instituted some twenty years later than the event at Oxford and three years after Haydn's death (at Vienna); but now, while our opportunities are comparatively manifold, the case is different. Yet the Oxford symphony is a masterpiece; and Haydn himself in his happiest moments of inspiration has not surpassed its final presto. Of Mendelssohn's Reformation Symphony—received with unabated enthusiasm, the charming allegro vivace, in B flat and G, being, as usual, encored—so much was written last year that in suggesting that it may brave an annual hearing for a long time to come, we have said all that is requisite. The D minor symphony of Schumann, in form the most original and independent, is in matter of detail the poorest of the four that came from his laboured and ambitious pen. A peculiarity in this symphony is that the various movements—introduction, allegro, romance, scherzo, and finale—run into each other, without finishing; so that the whole forms one continuous piece; while certain themes in the introduction and allegro reappear in other movements. A plan like this could only have been made acceptable by genius far above that of Schumann; and we must confess that in listening to his symphony we occasionally long for an interval of repose. Moreover, the leading theme of the allegro is so square-cut and uninviting, that its re-employment in the finale, in the major key and in connexion with another theme from the allegro, becomes in the end more or less of a bore.

Of the eight symphonies played before Christmas only one was new to the Crystal Palace audience. This, composed by Mozart in 1786, for the Winter Concerts at Prague,* is the symphony known to amateurs as the "Symphony in D without a minuet." The first allegro is as grandly designed and as elaborate in the working out of its details as any similar orchestral movement by the composer; and the andante for sweet and tender melody is unsurpassed. Strange that such a work by one of the masters of masters should now for the first time be introduced to an audience thoroughly familiarized with all the symphonies and overtures of Schumann (not to name other things of more questionable merit). But better late than never. The symphony was admirably played, and must have caused not a few to regret that Mozart receives less consideration at the Crystal Palace than is his fair due. For instance, among nineteen overtures included in the first set of twelve concerts, there was only one by Mozart—that to Figaro. There were three overtures by Beethoven—the Namensfeier,† Egmont, and Leonora (the great Leonora—No. 3 of the Fidelio series); two by Schubert—the Fresnade von Salamanka and Rosamunde; four by Mendelssohn—A Midsummer Night's Dream, Die Hebriden, the "Trumpet Overture," and Ruy Blas; Weber's Der Freischütz and Oberon; Schumann's Genovera; Cherubini's Medea; Rossini's Siège de Corinthe; Adolph Adam's Giralda; Herr Reinecke's König Manfred; Mr. Arthur Sullivan's In Memoriam; and Mr. H. Gadsby's Golden Legend. A brief remark about two or three of these is all that is called for—so many of them being old friends. Schumann's Genovera, the orchestral prelude to his only opera, is also one of his best—but, as customary with Schumann, monotonous, gloomy, and overcharged with anti-climax. Die beiden Freunde von Salamanka is the overture to an opera by Schubert composed to a libretto by his friend, Mayrhofer (which is lost). The rest of the music is still in manuscript, hidden away in some dark cellar in Vienna, where it is likely to remain until that amiable enthusiast, the Honorary Secretary to the Palestine Fund shall do for it what he did for Rosamunde and the symphonies. The overture, fresh and pretty, is one of the master's lightest, and might rank with his two preludes "in the Italian style." Nevertheless, like all that came from his prolific brain (at least all we know of), it contains things too good to be consigned to oblivion. The "Trumpet Overture" of Mendelssohn—a marvel, considering the age at which it was composed (16)‡—needs hearing again and again; so does the lengthified and tombling In Memoriam of our countryman, Mr. Sullivan, the encouragement given to whose music at the Crystal Palace is both advantageous to the concerts, and creditable to Mr. Manns, their director. Schubert's so-called Rosamunde (virtually the overture to the three-act operatic melodrama, Die Zauberharfe,§ produced at the An der Wien, Vienna, in 1820, the libretto by Hoffmann), is so genial and bright that it can never be unwelcome. At the same time it will hardly be denied that its composer has been allowed somewhat more than his just share of the Crystal Palace programmes. Mr. H. Gadsby's Golden Legend possesses unquestionable merit, which is more than can be alleged of Adolph Adam's Giralda. Besides these overtures, the splendid entr'acte and piquant air de ballet from Rosamunde (Schubert), some very laboured and meagre dance pieces from that heaviest of heavy operas, M. Gounod's Reine de Saba; an entr'acte, with ballet-music, from Herr Reinecke's König Manfred;

* Where his Nozze di Figaro, which had been almost snubbed in Vienna, was afterwards so well received as to induce the great musician to write Don Giovanni expressly for the Bohemians.

† Composed for the Nameday Festivities of Francis II.—a sort of companion to the Weihe des Hauses, in the same key (C), but an earlier and inferior work.

‡ It was partially re-written seven years later, when produced, under Mendelssohn's own direction, at the Düsseldorf Festival of 1833.

§ This overture was also played to a one-act operetta called variously Die Verschworenen, and Der häusliche Krieg—in 1823 or 1824.

and the adagio and scherzo from Herr Rubinstein's symphony, Ocean, were among the orchestral pieces during the first series of twelve concerts. Of the incidental music in Rosamunde we have spoken more than once. It is of its composer's very best. Herr Meinecke is dry and pretentious; and the only remarkable feature about his entr'acte is that the stringed instruments are muted. Take away his mutes and the music would say nothing. Mr. Manns, in the analytical programme, devotes a couple of pages to Herr Rubinstein, whom he designates as—"from top to toe a son of art of our time, who, driven by an irresistible impulse, works away nobly for a good eighteen hours per day, with his blood at fever heat, and even during the remaining six hours for rest cannot silence that demon of our age, the morbid desire to accomplish, in matters of art, what no one ever did before. As a reproductive artist his powers are truly prodigious, &c."

If this be the case, Herr Rubinstein must be a very extraordinary man—seeing that he can exist without sleep; and the only thing that surprises us, after so glowing a description, is the very small amount of originality to be found in the adagio and scherzo which that drove Mr. Manns into rhapsody. "That demon of our age" must have been unpropitious; for certainly the "morbid desire" to do what was never done before is by no means fulfilled in the Ocean symphony—which, by the way, we remember hearing some years ago, entire (without being greatly edified), at the Hanover Square Rooms. It may be, as Mr. Manns insists—though with astonishing indiscretion, naming Herr Rubinstein at one and the same time with Beethoven and Mendelssohn—that in his (Herr Rubinstein's) tone-pictures there is "mehr Empfindung als Malerei;" but when the "feeling" expresses nothing we might just as well have a little "painting" (as in Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony and Mendelssohn's Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt).

Three of the four concerts at which the programme comprised no symphony were devoted to choral works. Handel's Acis and Galatea, with Mozart's additional accompaniment, Rossini's Messe Solennelle (first time), and Mr. Arthur Sullivan's Prodigal Son (first time), each took up a day. Acis and the Prodigal Son were well enough given, although the Crystal Palace chorus is by no means on a par with its orchestra; but the performance of the Messe Solennelle was, on the whole, the least satisfactory since its first introduction in England. Mr. Sullivan's cantata was received—as it has been received everywhere else, since the Worcester Festival of last autumn (for which it was expressly composed)—with unqualified favour; and we are happy to be able to add that its merits entitle it to general recognition. The appearance of a work, from the pen of an English composer, with such solid claims to consideration, is so rare that it should be hailed with satisfaction by every one who looks hopefully at English art.

Among the interesting features of the performances are concertos, &c., for pianoforte, violin, and other instruments, with orchestral accompaniments. With these the first half of the series under notice was in no way behindhand. Beethoven's fifth, last, and greatest pianoforte concerto, the one in E flat, was played by Mr. Charles Hallé; Weber's pianoforte concerto in the same key by Herr Ernst Pauer; and Mendelssohn's Rondo Brillante, again in the same key, by Miss Agnes Zimmermann—the most remarkable achievement of the three being decidedly the last. But, like the violin concerto of Mendelssohn, chosen by M. Sainton, these pieces were already known to the Crystal Palace audience. Not so, however, a concerto in B flat, for violoncello, with orchestral accompaniments, the execution of the solo part in which, by Signor Piatti, was nothing short of perfection, while the work itself was scarcely less creditable to him as a composer than the performance of it was creditable to him as a virtuoso. This concerto is not only cleverly and effectively written, but in several passages, and more especially in the second movement—a largo in the key of E flat minor—exhibits a strong sense of musical fitness and beauty. Still more interesting was the Caprice in E major, for pianoforte and orchestra, one of the most graceful, refined, and original works of the most gifted of English musicians. It says little for our own native pianists, and not a great deal for the foreigners who flourish and thrive among us, that the only one who takes pains to master and bring forward constantly in public the music of Sterndale Bennett is Madame Arabella Goddard; but on the other hand the Cambridge Professor may console himself with the fact that probably no other would play it with such enthusiasm or could play it with such polished refinement as that accomplished lady. Such compositions as Professor Bennett's are not to be taken ad capiandum. They are extremely difficult, and must be assiduously and conscientiously studied. Madame Goddard invariably does; and hence her success whenever she comes forward with a concerto, or any other piece, from her gifted compatriot's pen.

A LENTEN CONCERT.

The Paris correspondent of the Daily Telegraph thus opens to us a Parisian salon in Lent:—

"Music again! Que voulez-vous? One must live in spite of the well-known judge's cynical objection, and it is an accepted article of faith that during Lent one cannot live in Paris without music. So in all the ministerial mansions the same vast saloons are opened to the same superbly dressed visitors, but instead of dancing to the music, you simply listen to it. On Thursday it was the 'Ministère de la Marine et des Colonies' that opened its hospitable doors to what the French papers will persist in calling 'le high-life.' There are few hotels that have more facilities for grand entertainments than the immense building in the Place de la Concorde, facing the Chamber of Deputies. The mere entrance was as beautiful as it was imposing, for the several flights of the angular stair-case afforded a constant change in the fairy-like coup d'œil. So lavish was the profusion of tropical plants surrounding the hall, climbing up the walls, spreading over the balconies, and hanging pendent from the galleries overhead, that the ladies, with their brilliant complexions, flashing jewels, and flowing lace, looked in the midst of all this exuberant foliage like superb animated flowers, or like dazzling birds of paradise that had flown from some Southern clime. The outside gallery overlooking the place was enclosed, and so artfully covered with plants and flowers, so cleverly decorated, and so filled with statues, that it seemed to form an integral portion of the substantial edifice itself. Thus the wide reception rooms, thrown into one long suite, were flanked on each side by bosquets that harmonised perfectly with the interminable conservatoir. This was exclusively appropriated to ladies, who were all seated, while their gentlemen, even more gorgeous in apparel, though far less grateful to the sight, "circulated" in the adjoining galleries. Even the orchestra, large enough to accommodate the full orchestra of the Conservatoire, looked like a bower—thanks to the mass of foliage by which it was surrounded; and from this end of the room the old comparison of a congregation of ladies to a parterre of flowers was literally realised. The music was excellent, and there was not too much of it. The orchestra played the scherzo and finale from Beethoven's symphony in D so delicately that I could not help regretting the omission of the heavenly slow movement, and should have enjoyed it still more if the opening allegro had also been included in the scheme. The scherzo from the Midsummer Night's Dream music was also tripped off with exquisite lightness. I have never heard Mdlle. Nilsson sing better the scena concluding the first act of La Traviata. Voice, expression, facility, and, may I add, manner, were alike charming. Mdlle. Krauss, a clever artist, with an ungrateful voice, gave Schubert's 'Marie,' orchestrated by M. Alary. It seemed to please much, and there was nothing to find fault with in the instrumentation, but for my own part I would rather have heard it with pianoforte accompaniment. This may be prejudice, however; the mere result of habit. But there certainly could be no two opinions about the charm that M. Faure's singing gave to a romance from Nicolo's Joconde, a fade affair, which one must be a Frenchman, I suppose, to appreciate. One of the most enjoyable things of the evening was the trio from the dear old Matrimonio segreto, which, nè en doplaise à M. Wagner, will soothe and cheer the unexacting mind until all melody is utterly banished from music. A great charm of the soirée consisted in the fact that, although, as you may imagine, the preparations must have been immense, there was a quiet drawing-room air about the way in which the artists rose from among the audience in their appointed order, that gave to the whole affair an idea of spontaneousness. Many people wandered about the endless suites of rooms long after the concert was over, admiring the marvellous of celebrated naval men, examining the elaborate Gobelin work of eighty years ago, and talking over the politics of the day; and it must have been long past one in the morning when the last visitor emerged from the hot, close rooms—thus doubly suggestive of a tropic clime—into the bright, cold, starlit night."

LEIPSIC.—The members of Riedel's Verein lately gave a fine performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, Op. 123. The solos were taken by Madame Otto (soprano), from the Royal Operahouse, Dresden; Madame Krebs-Muhafel (contralto), Dresden; Herr Rebling (tenor), of the Leipsic Stadttheater; and Herr Von Milde (base), from Weimar. Herr David played the violin solo in the "Benedictus," and Herr Papier presided at the organ.

THE BIRMINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(From the "Midland Counties Herald.")

In musical matters, as in other affairs, we rarely notice the rapid flight of time till a beat of his wings announces the return of some event of interest; and then we are seized with astonishment at the scythe-bearer's rapid pace, and begin to make preparations. Our Musical Festival will be held in the autumn of the present year, and will be of such importance, both for a philanthropic purpose, and for the musical prestige of our town, that the fact will plead our excuse for calling on all to be up and doing. Every one may give help. We have to make a struggle to hold our own in days when railways bring celebrities from the ends of Europe with magical dispatch. Let us look up home resources, and assure ourselves, as well as the world, that our Festivals stand at the head of all such meetings, at which the musical genius of the day may have a chance. We stand on a par with other places in securing solo vocal art; but it is in her choral strength that Birmingham has been unapproachable. Let us, then, look at our autumn campaign. We have a corps of veterans in the Festival Choral Society; and, thanks to Mr. Stockley, its ranks are never more efficient, notwithstanding the conduct of the committee, in frequently giving them nothing to do on a field day. Then we have volunteers, members of the Birmingham Amateur Harmonic Association, whose services have been equally good. From a report, furnished by Mr. Harrian, we find that during last year the following works have been rehearsed :—Schubert's "Song of Miriam," Mendelssohn's "Hear my prayer" and "Lord, bow down," Bennett's Richard Cœur-de-Lion, Spohr's "God, Thou art great," Mozart's Mass No. 1 and "Ave Verum," Haydn's Mass No. 1, Gade's Erl-King's Daughter, and H. Smart's Bride of Dunkerron, besides minor works; and the number of rehearsals has been forty-three, at which the average attendance has been seventy four. These meetings have culminated in three public rehearsals, directed by Mr. Sutton. The instrumental orchestra for the great occasion, we have the satisfaction of knowing, has, together with the general arrangements been put into the hands of Sir Michael Costa, the best musical organizer and conductor at present living; and to him the selection may safely be left. So far, matters look promising; but much remains to be done; and we trust that the Festival Committee, the town authorities, and the public will not let matters rest till too late for good.

ROBERT LE DIABLE IN PARIS.

The following graphic and spirited description of the revival of Meyerbeer's first French opera in Paris is from the Parisian correspondent of the Daily Telegraph :—

"The salle of the Grand Opera was worth seeing. Everybody in Paris celebrated for beauty, rank, and talent was there. The display of loveliness was remarkable, Madame de Mercy-Argenteau and Madame Cuvelier outshining their sister stars in brilliancy of complexion and toilets. The Prince and Princess Metternich were among the early comers, and M. Auber sat through the performance, passing the entr'actes in the foyer, walking up and down with the activity of eighteen summers, and letting fall in quick succession the good-natured mots which he can utter so well. All the artists not engaged on some stage were in the salle. Mdlle. Sessi, whom you are going to hear at Covent Garden in a few weeks, was conspicuous by her abundance of golden hair—her own—and you might have seen Madame Cabel. Mdlle. Bloch, who has at least one requisite for a dramatic singer, a handsome face; Mr. Beal Hehler, who is singing everywhere at concerts; Mdlle. Hisson, another fine-looking person, with fine voice, &c., &c. The Emperor and Empress arrived in the middle of the second act, and went away at the end of the third. The Empress almost hid her features behind the curtains, but the Emperor sat forward close to the stage. You may imagine that it was some new opera which drew all Paris to the theatre. The novelty is not forty years old; but the attraction was Mdlle. Nilsson's first appearance in a new part. You recollect the number of accidents that went far to make Robert le Diable a fiasco in 1831; or if you have any of your readers so juvenile as not to remember, they will have heard how Dorus Gras was almost smashed by the falling of machinery; how Taglioni, the chief Nun, had to jump prematurely out of her tomb to avoid being crushed by a cloud—clouds are always made of water, science notwithstanding; how poor Nourrit, Robert, fell down the trap prepared for Bertram; and how everybody said, at the end, that the opera was worth hearing on account only of the ballet. They might almost say as much now. True, that there was but one accident, but it lasted the whole evening, and affected every singer but one—the accident of singing out of time. I have never heard so many false notes in my life. To begin with Bertram, the most important character—M. Belcul has a loud, hollow voice, which never, except by chance, answers to the singer's intention—striking the ear as with a blow. Then M. Celin's light tenor is ridiculous in the declamation of Robert. If he sings a low-pitched phrase from the chest he opens his mouth, and lo, the passage is finished by a squeak; and then there is nothing of the hero about him. Madame Carvalho has not forgotten her careful training, and warbles bravura passages as neatly as a bird; but her thread-like voice is thinned into a filament, shaking as though it was possessed by delirium tremens, and generally out of tune. In the air de grâce she broke down; and her habit of walking as though her legs were tied together at the knee, does not improve her appearance. The bright spot was Mdlle. Nilsson, who not only sang with absolute correctness, but impersonated Alice, with an ingenious vivacity perfectly delightful. Nothing could be more natural or graceful than her singing of 'Quand je quittais la Normandie;' the insouciance of her manner heightening the dramatic effect of her defiance at the cross, braving the demon-tempter. There were fine touches about her performance which will, I dare say, come out more strongly when she plays in London, with a better entourage. It is thought treason here to say anything against the orchestra; but it seemed to me a great deal too loud. The scenery was splendid, especially in the third act. In the Convent of Ste. Rosalie we see one side of the cloisters in perspective, with steps leading into the dimly-lighted church, the other sides, with ruined arches and intermediate space, overgrown with brushwood, bathed in the bright cold moonlight. A singular impression of silence and desertion enhances the effect when the nuns, in grave-clothes, rise slowly from the opening tombs. They troop in long lines of 'sheeted dead,' in conventual costume, crosses on breasts and palm-branches in hands. They huddle together and hold silent converse. At the given signal they fling away their vestments and give themselves up to the wildest of spectatic orgies. Another point is that when Helena tries to seduce Robert by his love of play she draws him to a tomb whereon, as in Hogarth's picture of the idle apprentices, except that there is no beadle behind them, two nuns are throwing dice—an improvement on the original, which generally throat forward from the wings. Another improvement is in the last scene, which, although disclosed only for five minutes, represents a superb Byzantine basilica, with altar, nave, and transepts complete—example of lavish magnificence. The opera, staged completely, lasts from half past seven till half-past twelve. It is the first time I have ever heard Robert le Diable throughout, and will be the last! It is unfair to Meyerbeer to give the work entire. No singers can stand the strain, and no audience. The theatre was half empty before the tuts in the last act came on. How much pleasanter if all had been left out except Mdlle. Nilsson's solos and the ballet."

BISHENDEN AT HOME.

Mr. Bishenden favours us with the following :—

"A grand concert took place on Thursday evening se'nnight in the Town Hall, Hemel Hempstead, Herts, under the patronage of the High Bailiff, etc. Some excellent songs and solos were sung by well-known talent engaged from London, the great attraction of the concert being the engagement of Mr. C. J. Bishenden, the celebrated bass. Mr. Bishenden being a great favourite, and native of the town, numbers from the surrounding towns came to hear him, who had heard of his success in London, and show their appreciation of his singing by giving him a very flattering reception. A scene of great confusion and uproar occurred during the concert, owing to the crowded state of the hall (which is a very large one), several ladies fainted, volunteers in uniform secured an opening for the fainting ones to be carried out; in the mean time, outside the hall the noise was deafening, kept up by those disappointed people who could not gain admittance. The whole of the vocal music gave great satisfaction; and a very able and efficient band played selections from Donizetti's opera, Lucia di Lammermoor, which was well received."

To the Editor of the "Musical World."

SIR,—Having read a letter, signed M. H., which appeared in the Musical Times of February, I fully concur in all that their correspondent says in reference to the study of the violin, and other instruments "at present not in vogue," becoming more general, as well as being pursued by both sexes. Our friend, M. H., omitting to mention a medium by which the diffusion of the study of such instruments might be effected, induces me to take the liberty of laying before you a means which I think would not only tend to the accomplishment of the object in question, but cultivate the musical tastes of all classes of society.

What I propose is, that every town of importance throughout the United Kingdom should have its Public Music School, or Academy, with a staff of competent teachers, where, in addition to the theory of music, in its several departments, vocalism should be taught, and every musical instrument worthy of study, on terms sufficiently moderate to be within the reach of all classes. If this project could be set on foot, its result would be that of abolishing the innumerable class of persons styling themselves teachers, but who in reality make a mockery of the science, giving their pupils distaste for its study, by the erroneous and abortive method of their tuition. Hoping you will think this worthy of a place in your columns,—I am, Sir, yours truly,

M. E. H.

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

Sims Reeves.

Apropos of Mr. Reeves' farewell concert we read in the Athenæum of Saturday last :—

"Mr. Sims Reeves, being on the point of starting for Italy, took farewell of his friends in St. James's Hall, yesterday week. He had good cause for gratification at the result, because it proved that his friends are as numerous as ever, and as much as ever disposed to believe him the first of tenors. Such an eager and enthusiastic audience has not of late crowded St. James's Hall. The audience had every reason to be satisfied. Mr. Reeves was in fine voice, and sang four of his best songs in his own unequalled style. The four were well chosen. 'Deeper and deeper still' and 'Adelaide' make very different demands upon a singer's powers, while in 'My pretty Jane' and 'Tom Bowling' two distinct classes of ballads are represented. Mr. Reeves, therefore, was called upon for a rare display of versatility; but, as will promptly be assumed, he was equal to the occasion. We can hardly say which song he gave with the truest expression, and in the most artistic style. Enough that each was as perfect as fastidious taste could wish."

Young Germany.

The Sunday Times speaks thus of Herr Coenen's recent concert at the Hanover Square Rooms :—

"The concert (one of a series) given in Hanover Square Rooms on Tuesday, by Herr W. Coenen, had for its object to familiarise the public with chamber music by modern German composers. We think the object both laudable and useful, not because Herr Coenen is likely to introduce much that is good, but because he is likely to show us much that is bad, and so to put public taste on its guard. We hear a good deal about the 'intellectual' musicians, who are now the objects of faith and adoration to our Teutonic cousins. Herr Coenen has no fear these music; a painful process it may be, but assuredly a salutary one. It is well to know what to avoid. The programme comprised a trio for piano, violin, and violoncello, by Herr Raff; a quartet for strings by Herr Max Bruch; and a similar work by a composer whose name we had never met with before. We could not expect us to discuss these unknown works at length, because it is not probable that they will be heard a second time, and their intrinsic merit would fail to repay such labour. Enough if we observe that nearly every movement is an attempt to say something profound, which turns out to be uninteresting. Why the music goes on when it goes on, and stops when it stops, the hearer neither knows nor cares."

On the same subject the Athenæum remarks :—

"Herr Coenen gave a concert of chamber music, at the Hanover Square Rooms, on Tuesday, selecting his programme from the compositions of modern writers, such as Raff and Max Bruch. The result made it hardly worth while for us to enter into details. Nobody is likely to have a second chance of hearing the works; and those who were present would hardly thank us if we reminded them lengthily of what they endured. So we let the affair pass."

Berlioz v. Haydn.

In the course of its article upon the Crystal Palace concert of Saturday week, the Athenæum says :—

"There were two novelties in the Crystal Palace programme of Saturday—Berlioz's overture, Les Francs Juges, and Haydn's symphony in C, known best, perhaps, as 'letter B.' The overture is one of its composer's prodigious efforts to illustrate events by sounds; or in the words of Mr. Manns, 'to enforce the idea that music must be written upon a definite programme.' Hence, in the intention of Berlioz, the music of Les Francs Juges depicts the doings of the mysterious "Vehmgerichte." So far we are sure; further, all is conjecture; and even Mr. Manns grants that 'no two hearers can agree as to the meaning of a single bar unless by pure chance.' This is unfortunate, because when programme-music tells its tale in a manner open to a score of interpretations it can be of little worth. As a matter of fact, however, M. Berlioz, extravagant in everything, has merely illustrated in an extravagant fashion the weakness of programme-music generally. Mr. Manns helped his audience to a meaning very timidly. He pointed out what might be considered 'heart-rending cries of despair,' and an 'appeal for mercy and the justice of Heaven'; but could get no further with any satisfaction to himself. What the audience thought of the terrific noises which assailed their ears is easy to imagine. It possibly occurred to some that had Milton foreseen M. Berlioz's overture, he would have furnished Pandemonium with an orchestra. Haydn's symphony, never played before at the Crystal Palace, satisfied all to whom pure melody and masterly treatment of details appeal. Of course the work is symmetrical, and carried out after a strictly orthodox design; but Haydn never fails to show how, with all this regard for form, it is possible to be free. We know not which movement to select for precedence, and therefore adopt the public verdict given unmistakably in favour of the andante. No more tuneful themes were ever written even by the tuneful Haydn than those most applauded by Saturday's audience. For professing the work Mr. Manns deserves credit enough to leave a balance in his favour after deductions on account of Les Francs Juges."

Herr Hiller's Symphony.

The Daily News expresses its opinion of Herr Hiller's Symphony in E—"Es muss doch Frühling werden"—in the following terms :—

"The symphony is the work of one of the most distinguished and prolific of living German composers. A contemporary and friend of Mendelssohn, a man of high musical and general cultivation, and a distinguished pianist, Herr Hiller has produced compositions in the most ambitious forms of the art—all bearing the impress of earnest thought and consummate skill, if not always rising to the height of the intention. The work now referred to was first performed in England in May, 1865, at the second concert of the defunct Musical Society. It was composed in illustration of the motto, "Es muss doch Frühling werden," and is supposed to be suggestive of the contest between the lingering winter and the advancing spring. The first movement is perhaps the least successful of the whole, although containing much of beauty and power, the first quality being especially evidenced in the melodious episode, or second subject. The adagio is the happiest portion of the symphony, being full of that freshness and ideal fragrance suggested by the return of spring. Highly characteristic and playful is the scherzo, relieved by the gentle contrast of the trio, with its sostenuto effects for wind instruments; while the finale is replete with joy and life, such as attend the full development of spring delights. The orchestral treatment is throughout that of a consummate master of his art; and the entire symphony was listened to with great interest."

Beethoven and Mendelssohn, "Posthumous."

We read in the Athenæum of Saturday last :—

"At the last Monday Popular Concert, Beethoven's posthumous quartet in B flat (Op. 131) was, for the fourth time, the wonder and admiration of Mr. Chappell's audience. We refrain from discussing the first movement. It is Beethoven's, and must be played; but, unfortunately, the allegro is not attended with the special power necessary for its comprehension. The rest is intelligible, and can never fail to make a profound impression. Herr Joachim's leading of the adagio rose to the level of the music. It was a performance not easily forgotten. Another posthumous work had a great success; the composer, this time, being Mendelssohn. Most amateurs know the andante and scherzo which are with reason presumed to be portions of an unfinished quartet. They know, also, that the master appears, in these fragments, to great advantage; the ingenious and melodious variations of the andante, and the piquant scherzo belonging to Mendelssohn's happiest efforts. The latter is 'fairy music' of the sort its composer created, that is to say, 'fairy music' which more nearly approaches the ideal than anything beside. It was covered in a manner imperative enough to bring back Herr Joachim and his companions for the purpose of repetition."

Weimar.—The General Musical Association of Germany (Patron, the Grand-Duke of Weimar) will hold its annual meetings here from the 26th to the 29th May, and, at the same time, give a grand festival in commemoration of Beethoven's hundredth birthday. The Abbate Franz Liszt who will return from Bonn about the beginning of April, will probably contribute a piece composed for the occasion, and entitled Beethoven.

Munich.—At whatever hour a train starts, or a theatrical performance begins, there are always a certain number of persons sure to be late. In the case of the train, if they catch it, they do so only at the expense of a cab, or else at considerable damage to their "wind," especially if they are corpulent and not in the full vigour of youth. A person who is late at a theatre, however, suffers, as a rule, no personal inconvenience himself, but he inflicts a great deal upon others. Such, at any rate, is the view taken of the matter by the management of the Theatre Royal here. The consequence is that they have issued a regulation to the effect that no one coming into the Theatre after the commencement of the overture is allowed to enter the pit or the parquet until the overture is concluded. Any one, moreover, entering during an act is obliged to stand at his side of the pit or parquet till the act is over. The new regulation has been very well received by the public.

Dresden.—Herr Jäger, a tenor from the Schwerin Theatre, has been engaged for the Royal Operahouse. He possesses a very pleasing voice, and an excellent method.—The new Theatre Royal is to be something very magnificent. Professor Semper has completed all the plans. They are drawn out in conformity with those he prepared for the "Festival Theatre" at Munich, that was to be erected according to the principles advocated by Herr R. Wagner. The ground-plan nearly resembles that of the Greek theatre, and Herr R. Wagner's idea of keeping the orchestra out of sight will be a leading feature in it. The new edifice will stand rather further back than the old one, and C. M. von Weber's statue will be removed from where it now stands and be set up in the square before it. It is believed that the Professor's plans will cost more to carry out than the 400,000 thalers voted for the purpose. That, however, is nothing extraordinary. What architect ever sent in an estimate which he did not afterwards greatly exceed?

RICHARD WAGNER'S *MEISTERSINGER VON NÜRNBERG.

A Historical Explanation.

Wagner's Meistersinger will shortly be produced at the Royal Operahouse here, and we take the opportunity, in the following lines, of coming to the assistance of those who are not sufficiently acquainted with the history of this mediæval guild to appreciate fully the realistic manner in which the author has carried out his task. Should the reader desire to obtain further details, or wish to consult the original authorities, he will find full information in J. C. Wagenseil's book, Von der Meistersinger origine, praerogativis, nihilitate et institutis (Of the Origin, Prerogatives, Utilitate et Institutis of the Meistersingers), an appendix to his Description of the City of Nuremberg, Altdorf, 1697, a work from which Franz Muller, the latest writer on the subject, obtained all the materials for his Versuch zur Einführung in die gleichnamige Dichtung R. Wagner's (An Essay at an Exposition of R. Wagner's Poem of the same name), Munich, 1869, Kaiser.—After attaining in the 16th century a certain culminating point, and then gradually falling off, the art of the Mastersingers held its ground at Nuremberg till the commencement of the 18th century; at length, however, the schools were so badly attended, that the contributions in the money-box no longer covered the expenses of the meetings (in the Catharinen Kirche). Finally, the meetings were held only once in ten or twelve years, and the last public school was held about 1770.

The Mastersingers exercised their trade, or, if the reader prefers it, their art, according to the Schulordnung and the Tabulatur. In conformity with the Schulordnung, Singschulen, or singing classes, were held after afternoon service on Sundays and festivals, and no member was allowed to absent himself without a valid excuse. In Nuremberg, the Singschulen were held generally in St. Catherine's Church. A low platform, with a table and a large black desk, was erected near the choir. Benches were ranged round the table, and the platform was closed in with curtains. This platform was assigned to the Merker, or marker, the leading member of the governing body, and it was his duty to note, observe, or "mark" the faults of any singer. A small professorial chair was the seat given to any one singing a "master's song." The singing was divided into "Freisingen" and "Hauptsingen." Any one could take part in the former. The subjects of it consisted of stories from Holy Writ, and "true and honourable profane mundane events, together with good moral maxims." There was no "marking" in free-song. The Uebersinger ("Oversinger"), that is, the singer who was acknowledged to be the best, obtained the ornament entitled the "Gehenq" ("Pendant"). This was, in Nuremberg, originally a long silver chain, and later a cord, with large silver tassels, and called "King David," because there was a representation of King David with a harp upon the middle shilling. The second prize was a garland of flowers embroidered in silk. Any person wishing to learn the art of mastersong, took lessons of a master, who must have carried off the "Kränzel" ("Jewel") at least once. If an apprentice desired to be received into the society, the marker subjected him to an examination. The "Tabulatur" contained all the rules relating to the practice of the Master-Singers' art. An entire Master-song was called a "Bar." This might contain several "Gesätze" ("sets"). A "Gesatz" consisted of two "Rollen" which had to be of the same "Ton" (similar in the versification and melody) and equal measure (number of the syllables and arrangement of the rhymes, called "Gebäude," i.e., "build"). The two "Rollen" were followed by the "Abgesang" which was different in "Ton" and measure to the "Rollen." After the "Abgesang" there was sometimes a finale. The rhymes were divided into "stumme" ("dumb"), rhymes of one syllable, and "klingende" ("sounding") rhymes of two syllables. "Waisen" ("orphans") were unrhymed lines in the middle, or at the end of a "Gebäude." "Pausen" ("Pauses") were words of one syllable, forming a verse of three syllables but rhyming with the next verse. "Schlepreime" were similar words of two syllables. No line was allowed to contain more than thirteen syllables, because more could not well be sung at one breath, especially if there was to be a "zierliche Blume" (" graceful flower," i.e., cadence) in the verse. The Nuremberg Tabulatur permitted thirty-three faults; whoever made more was pronounced to have failed. The songs had to be sung from memory. The "Ton," that is, the particular kind of verse and its melody, was more highly esteemed by the Mastersingers than the idea and poetic dash. Wagenseil gives a catalogue of 222 such "Singweisen" ("Melodies") from Nuremberg alone, and prints, also, a few "Gesätze" with their melodies. The "Ton" or the "Weise" was entirely independent of the language, so much so that, very frequently, the "Weise," was invented first and then the poem. It was not till the "Ton" was pronounced faultless, that the author was allowed to compose the words to it, the subject for them being generally given him. The four "Hauptveisen" or "Hauptione" were called the "meisterliche Hort," and it was necessary that everyone desirous of becoming a master should be able to sing them. If a singer sang his "Ton" well and smoothly, he had to give it an honourable and not contemptible name, and beg two persons to stand godfathers to it.

II.

It requires a bold fancy to believe that the period of the German Minnesang was truly poetical and genuinely artistic, but this is doubly the case as regards the Meistersang—or Song of the Master-Singers. German poetry sprang neither from the people nor the minstrel, but from the German folk's-song, which ran on, quietly and without being remarked, by their side. From the very fact that art had sunk so low, and consisted only in the rude imitation of the old forms, the practice of it became gradually so easy that the number of singers went on increasing and extending among all classes. In opposition to the professional poets, who wandered more especially from the court of one prince to another, and thus represented the Epigoni of the Minnesingers, the Master-Singers took up their position as a new element, separating the more decidedly from the others the more the strolling singers sank in public estimation, and the greater the importance which they, the Master-Singers, attached to moral earnestness in their lives and in their poetry. The Master-Singers established permanent societies in the cities, but we know none of the details of their origin. According to an old legend held in high reverence by the Guild, twelve masters,† including the most celebrated of the 13th century, who, strange to say, were some of those who took part in the Singers' Tournament on the Wartburg, invented Master-Song in the year 962, during the reign of the Emperor Otto I., all doing so at the same time and independently of each other. Having, in their songs, however, scourged the Pope and the clergy for their dissolute lives, they were accused before Pope Leo XVIII. of heresy; at the Pope's request, the Emperor summoned them to Pavia, and afterwards to Paris, where, in the presence of the Emperor, of the Pope's Legate, and of many nobles and scholars, they gave specimens of their art and and freed themselves from the reproach of heresy. Hereupon, they had an act of incorporation granted them by the Emperor, who also conferred on them certain privileges. This tradition is supported by no documentary proofs, and does all claims on our belief from the fact that singers of the 13th century are named as the inventors of the "holdselige Kunst," or "Gentle art." It is, on the other hand, certain, that the lovers of singing assembled for this purpose of, practising together at a very early period, and it is not improbable that it was Heinrich Frauenlob, who established the first vocal union of this description in Mayence, though this union could not have possessed the regular form which we find in the subsequent Singerschulen, or Schools for Singers. The oldest document relating to the Mastersingers dates from the year 1387; it is a charter of the Emperor, Charles IV., conferring on the Meisterschulen, or Master-Schools, the right to assume a coat of arms. After this period, Meistersangerschulen, or Schools for Master-Singers, sprang up in most of the large cities of Germany; next to Mayence, which was, as it were, the high school and the rendezvous of the Mastersingers, and where the archives of the fraternity were kept, because the school there was really, or was reputed to be, older than any other, Strassburgh, Kolnar, Nuremberg, Augsburgh, Regensburgh, and Frankfort, were known and celebrated for their flourishing schools.

From the fact that the Mastersingers themselves regarded some of the leading court-poets as the founders of their fraternity, it is evident that Meistergesang is really nothing more than a continuation of the Minnegesang, and that it was the aim of the schools to preserve the purity of the art handed down to them. The sole, but, at the same time, important difference between the older Minnegesang and the subsequent Meistergesang consisted in the fact that the former was practised by poets with a courtly education, and generally of noble descent, and the latter by borghers, and at a later period, almost by mechanics, who cultivated it in addition to their regular calling, while the courtly poets made it the object of their life, and their sole profession; and, also, in the fact that the Meistersinger formed an exclusive guild, with fixed

Wolfgang Rohn, or Rahm, a knight; 7. Hans Ludwig Marner, a nobleman; 8. Bartel Regenbogen, a smith; 9. Sigmar the Wise, otherwise called the Roman of Zwickau; 10. Conrad Geiger, or Jäger, of Würzburg, a musician; 11. Cantzler, a fisherman and, 12. Stephan Stoll, or Old Stoll, a repemaker. According to other authorities, there were only four: Frauenlob, Regenbogen, Marner, and Heinrich von Muglin.

laws, strictly laying down the way in which their art was to be treated, while the Minneringer treated it freely, and were influenced only by the laws contained in art itself.

BROUGH SOUVENIRS.

(From the "Liverpool Daily Post.")

The late William Brough's first wife was Miss Annie Romer, a young lady who for a short period created immense enthusiasm in Liverpool, while singing at the old Liver Theatre, as the prima donna of an English opera company under the direction of Mr. Howard Glover. Miss Annie Romer was a native of Liverpool, and niece of Mr. Frank Romer, the composer of many songs once highly popular; and of Miss Emma Romer (Mrs. Almond), who for many years rivalled Miss Rainforth as the heroine of Balfe's earlier operas.

When engaged at the Liver Theatre, Miss Annie Romer was about nineteen years of age, attractive in appearance, and gifted with a bright, sympathetic, soprano voice, which had been carefully trained; while as an actress she was full of intensity and genuine dramatic force—though in those days operatic artists were not expected to display any special talent for acting, singing being considered, both on the Italian and English lyric stages, the sine qua non of the prima donna or prima tenore. At the Liver Theatre Miss Romer's greatest successes were achieved in Sonnambula, The Night Dancers (an admirable opera of Loder's), and Lucia. At this time Jenny Lind was in the very zenith of her fame, and critics and amateurs who had seen and admired the famous Swedish prima donna were fain to confess that the youthful English vocalist—in Sonnambula more especially—was, relatively speaking, but little inferior, except in the quality of voice and the method of using it, which experience and careful tuition had enabled Jenny Lind to bring to perfection. As an actress, however, Miss Annie Romer was far superior to the chilly Swedoise; and we have rarely seen on the Italian or English operatic stage anything more stirring, pathetic, and impressive than her passionately dramatic and natural acting in the bed-room scene of Sonnambula and the mad scene of Lucia. For months and months Miss Romer's extraordinary talents and personal charms attracted crowded audiences to the "little Liver," which in those days held a position very similar to that now occupied by the Prince of Wales's Theatre. Night after night the young artist's brilliant vocalism and dramatic abandon evoked an amount of hearty enthusiasm which in these days is chiefly reserved for self-styled "French dancers," who glory in rivalling the shameless indecencies which were once the chief delight of Parisian students and cosmopolitan roues. To give the present generation some idea of Annie Romer, we may say that she was then an undeveloped Nilsson—we mean the Nilsson of the present day, who is a very different person from the coldly correct artist who debuted at Her Majesty's Theatre some three years ago. Miss Romer had the intelligent and mobile face, the bright smile, the dramatic intensity, and the graceful easy style and manner which gives such a peculiar and nameless charm to every performance of Nilsson, and which makes her an artist quite unique. Unhappily "whom the gods love die young;" and shortly after her marriage to William Brough the young and sympathetic prima donna, of whom the Liverpool public were so proud, in whom so many hopes were centered, and whose professional future was so promising, was cut off, just as a long career of fame and happiness dawned before her.

In connection with the marriage of William Brough and Miss Romer, a few words relative to it will doubtless interest many of our readers, while it recalls to the writer—then a youth to whom literary and artistic celebrities were almost demi-gods—one of the happiest and most delightful days of his life. The marriage took place at the house of Mr. Jabez Hogg, the well-known surgeon and littérateur, who then resided in Gower Street, London, and who, like several members of the Brough family, was at that time connected with the Illustrated News. Amongst the guests were Dickens, Bulwer, Douglas Jerrold, H. Sutherland Edwards, J. V. Bridgeman, H. Webster, Madame Celeste, B. Brough (father of the famous "Brothers," and himself a popular dramatist in his youth), Robert B. Brough, Geo. Hodder, and various other literary and professional persons less known to fame. As might be anticipated, the wedding breakfast was an event to be remembered. There was no stiffness or chilly formality: even the great aristocratic Bulwer—radiant in a shirt front of wonderful and elaborate design, which Jullien would have envied—laughed and joked like an ordinary author of "commoner" clay. Douglas Jerrold fully sustained his reputation as one of the most brilliant wits of the day, and, suitable to the occasion, his bon mots were all honey and no vinegar. It was on this occasion that Madame Celeste made her début as an orator, and so well did she acquit herself that she not only evoked the hearty applause of her critical audience, but acquired a reputation which has several times since obliged her to "get on her legs." Webster did not shine as an orator at all in comparison with "Madame," whose piquant, epigrammatic style of speaking made her then partner appear to such disadvantage as to provoke from a budding wag present a remark about "Benjamin's mess"—a venerable joke—which nearly extinguished the popular manager, then in the hey-day of his managerial and professional career. The delights of this unique wedding-day culminated in a ball, the recollection of which makes the writer remember that he is now growing rather too old for such active pleasures, and that he is also doubtless getting a trifle prosy.

PROVINCIAL.

LIVERPOOL.—Recent notices in the local papers speak favourably of Mr. Wood's new prima donnas. The Daily Courier says:—

"Mdlle. Reboux assumed the part of the Countess with considerable ability. There was much to admire, her acting being intelligent and her by-play in some of the humorous scenes highly effective; while her singing was generally good, and her efforts were warmly applauded. Madame Monbelli surprised us by her excellent and spirited assumption of the part of Cherubino. 'Voi che sapete' was encored."

We read as thus in the Daily Post:—

"Mr. Santley had for his Countess the new soprano, Mdlle. Reboux. She is an impressive stage singer, and may be trusted to take a very emphatic view of everything she undertakes. Her notion of the Countess is by far more strenuous and tragic than is usual—we will not say than the occasion demands, for a lady is entitled to attach what importance she pleases to connubial felicity, an artist with a tragic turn may be forgiven for looking on the Countess in the Nozze as a sort of suffering Lady Macbeth. Mdlle. Reboux has undoubtedly great powers. In parts to which action and declamation are germane, Mdlle. Reboux will no doubt achieve legitimate success."

In its notice of Don Giovanni as performed by the troupe of Messrs. Gye and Mapleson, the paper just quoted remarks about Herr Formes's Leporello:—

"Thus Formes, indubitably the best Leporello on the stage, again realised the part of the roguish servant with all the humour which has distinguished him on previous occasions. There was at times in the upper notes a slight uncertainty, especially in the early part of the work; but this wore off as the evening advanced, and he not only sang very well in the latter part of the first act and the whole of the second, but was very fine in the concerted pieces, especially in the first finale and the sextet. In the scenes with Elvira, and the concluding one in the opera, as well as in the invitation to supper, he was particularly good—his fun and terror being equally humorous."

EDINBURGH.—We read in the Scotsman, of March 26th:—

"Yesterday afternoon, Professor Oakeley performed on the organ in the Music Class-room the following selection of music, prefaced with explanatory remarks:—

"Organ Preludes on Chorales—'Wachet auf, ruft uns die Stimme,' A.D. 1599; 'Wir Glauben 'all an einen Gott,' A.D. 1525—Bach. 'Agnus Dei,' First Mass; 'Benedictus,' Requiem—Mozart. Funeral March, from Op. 26; Beethoven. Organ Fantasia, in C minor; Hesse. 'Festklingend,' Op. 38, No. 13; 'Abendlied,' Op. 85, No. 12; Schumann. Overture, 'Samson;' Handel.

"Mr. Oakeley remarked that, in addition to some volumes of preludes and fugues for the organ, Sebastian Bach left behind him a large collection of preludes on the melodies of chorales, choral hymns, or, as we should say, psalm tunes; and that these compositions are of the highest interest, and are constructed with masterly skill and consummate art. Both performance and cultivation of this subtle and recondite style of organ composition are almost entirely neglected in Britain. This may be owing in some measure to the fact that it is not the custom, as it is with our Teutonic neighbours, to introduce choral melodies with an organ prelude upon them. In Germany organists frequently show their skill and knowledge of counterpoint by masterly preludes, often extemporaneous, of this kind; indeed some such skill and knowledge would be expected from any candidate for the post of organist. Germany is rich in chorales, and the best psalm tunes in Britain and other countries are those which are modelled on, or in, the same elevated style as these old Lutheran and pre-Lutheran hymns. The great German masters have recognized the excellence of the national chorales by having very frequently made use of them in their cantatas, oratorios, organ compositions, &c. Mendelssohn has introduced them with great effect in his Lobgesang, St. Paul, Elijah, and organ sonatas. In his St. Paul he gives us the old melody composed in 1540, known to us as 'To God on high;' also one about a century later, which we recognize as 'To Thee, O Lord, I yield my spirit' (which was played from time to time, and with great effect, by the brass bands outside St. Paul's Cathedral at the funeral of the Duke of Wellington); and also the chorale on which the first prelude in this programme is made, namely, 'Wachet auf, ruft uns die Stimme,' composed in 1590, and introduced by Mendelssohn with such masterly skill in his overture to St. Paul, and subsequently in that oratorio as 'Sleepers, wake.' In his treatment of the same subject for organ, Bach commences with an exquisite melody assigned to the right hand merely in single notes, with pedal accompaniment occurring on the principal measures or beats of each bar; a melody entirely distinct and unlike from the chorale which is given to the tenor voice and the left hand, and of this each line or phrase is in turn introduced throughout the prelude, at certain points of the windings of the upper part melody, with which the 'Canto fermo,' or chorale, is twined and interwoven by the great master with all his art—each melody, both in right and left hand, continuing its widely different story, wholly independent of, or rather, in vivid contrast to, its confrère. The second prelude, on a still older chorale, 'We all believe in one God,' is in an entirely different style. Bach has here chosen the fugal form, and unless the subject of the chorale is well known, it is difficult to trace it. This composition, though fugal, is not, strictly speaking, a fugue, as the bass or pedal part does not take the fugal subject, but one of its own; and here the hand, or rather the tread, of the giant may be noticed. And, in allusion to this gigantic entry of the pedals, this prelude has been erroneously termed and published in England as the 'Giant Fugue.' The Professor, in conclusion, tendered his thanks to the ladies who had kindly presented the curtain in front of the organ."

SHREWSBURY.—The local chronicle says:—

"The presentation of a testimonial to Dr. Sloman took place in the Town Hall, on Monday week. The Mayor, Thomas Bowen, Esq., was voted to the chair; and at once asked the vicar, the Rev. J. E. Hill, on behalf of the subscribers present Dr. Sloman with the testimonial. The Rev. J. E. Hill said that he had much pleasure in acceding to the request of the Mayor to present the testimonial, which he saw before him, to Dr. Sloman, on behalf of his friends and late pupils. The testimonial consists of a handsome silver tea and coffee service, and other silver articles. The coffee-pot bears the following inscription:—'Presented to Robert Sloman, Mus. Doc., by some of his friends and pupils on his leaving Welshpool, Christmas, 1869.' The subscribers' list is headed by the Earl of Powis, Countess Powis, Lady Edward Herbert, Earl and Countess Vane, Lady Edwards, Sir W. W. Wynn, Major Corbett, Archdeacon Clive, Archdeacon Ffoulks, Rev. J. E. Hill, vicar, and Major Pugh."

SUNDERLAND.—We read what follows in the Durham Advertiser:—

"On Monday evening last, a grand miscellaneous concert was given in the Athenæum, Sunderland, under distinguished patronage. The programme included two very clever readings by Messrs. Skelton and Middleton, and two pieces for pianoforte and flute, effectively rendered by Messrs. Chambers and Perry. Amongst the vocal pieces were 'Bid me discourse' and 'Thaddy O'Flinn,' by Miss Tunnett, who received a well-merited encore. The duet, 'Larboard Watch,' by Mr. Wooley, of Darlington, and Mr. Lambert, of Durham Cathedral Choir, was also encored. Mr. Wooley, who possesses a fine tenor voice, and sings well, was encored in 'The Death of Nelson' and 'Maid of Athens,' both of which he repeated. The same compliment was enthusiastically accorded to Mr. Lambert for his songs, 'When time hath bereft thee' and 'The Holy Friar.' The latter is a song peculiarly adapted for a voice of his calibre, the tremendous roll down to double G at the finish, for which he stands unrivalled, created quite a furore. He responded with 'Simon the Cellarer' and 'A Cobbler.' Mr. Chambers, of Whitby, accompanied all the pieces on the pianoforte. There was a crowded audience."

DUBLIN.—Respecting the third concert of the Philharmonic Society we read in the Irish Times of Tuesday:—

"The first part consisted of Mendelssohn's Son and Stranger. The characters were represented by Miss Fennell (Ursula), Miss Bessie Herbert (Lisbeth), Mr. Peele (Hermann), Mr. Richard Smith (Kranz), and Mr. Grattan Kelly (the Mayor). The orchestral portion was decidedly the best, and we may instance the rendering of the exquisite 'Night Interlude' as the most commendable feature of the performance. Mr. Vernon Rigby made his first appearance at these concerts, and essayed Beethoven's 'Adelaide.' His rendering of this and subsequent soli was very effective, and created a most favourable impression. His singing of Blumenthal's 'Message' was so good that its repetition was re-demanded. Another new comer, Chevalier Antoine De Kontsky, pianist, made his first appearance. This gentleman is considerably beyond the period of life when artists seek for popularity outside their immediate locality; but he is yet a performer of great ability. His execution of Beethoven's concerto in E flat was a performance of the first order, as was also his delivery of his own fantasia on airs from Faust. Miss Fennell sang Salamon's 'Oh! if thou wert mine own, love' with her usual effectiveness. The most successful item was the finished rendering of Stevenson's 'When Damon is present' by the members of the Glee and Madrigal Union, which was unanimously encored. The overture to Euryanthe commenced the second part, and was well played by the band. Some other glees and solos were given. Mr. Bussell conducted with ability, and accompanied Mr. Rigby on the piano."

NEW MUSIC.

Memory. Song. Words by G. E. NEWTON. Music by WILLIAM NEWTON. [London: Duncan Davison & Co.]

THIS song is graceful and well written above the average. Apart from the melody, which has merits of its own, the accompaniment is important, and adds much to the general effect. The composer evidently has a desire to go out of the beaten path in this matter. The desire is young at present, but, if he nourish it, time will cure the defect.

Come back again, Darling. Song. Words and Music by WILLIAM NEWTON. [London: Duncan Davison & Co.]

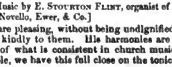
TONIC, subdominant, dominant; tonic, subdominant, dominant—those who like this order strictly adhered to, will like this song. At the same time, we must say that monotony is avoided, or hidden, by the charm of a really pretty melody.

Oh! say not woman's heart is bought. Transcribed for the pianoforte by ADAM WRIGHT. [London: Robert Cocks & Co.]

WE don't see the need for transcribing Whittaker's song, and, at the same time, are conscious that it would be unfair to apply the objection especially to Mr. Wright's work. Where, in point of fact, is the need for any such things? The transcription is tolerably well done, is not elaborate, and may be useful.

Four Hymns. Set to Music by E. STOUNTON FLINT, organist of St. John's Dulwich. [London: Novello, Ewer, & Co.]

MR. FLINT'S melodies are pleasing, without being undignified, and congregations would take kindly to them. His harmonies are somewhat too free for our notion of what is consistent in church music. In the second tune, for example, we have this full close on the tonic:—



Mr. Flint should set his face like a flint against such a harrowing progression.

Tell him I love him yet. Song. Poetry by W. M. FRAED. Music by ALFRED SCOTT GATTY. [London: Robert Cocks & Co.]

THE words of this song are aptly illustrated by its music. Mr. Gatty has written a good melody, with simple and appropriate accompaniments, and, moreover, has secured originality, to some extent, by the plan of his song, and by an uncommon final cadence.

Gem of my Heart. Song. Words by W. HITCHMAN. Music by WILLIAM NEWTON. [London: Duncan Davison & Co.]

A SIMPLE song, with a well marked and pleasing tune. An episode in the subdominant key (G) is an agreeable feature.

The Northern Star. Ballad. Words anonymous. Music by ALFRED SCOTT GATTY. [London: Robert Cocks & Co.]

THE music here is as simple as the music of a ballad should be; but some of it is doubtful, to say the least. Where is Mr. Gatty's authority for this:—

and this:—

Till we know and are satisfied, we must say, "Fie! Mr. Gatty."

GENOA.—The new opera, Un Capriccio di Donna, music by the Cavaliere Antonio Cagnoni, and libretto by Sig. Ghislanzoni, has proved a success.

THE THREATENED FESTIVALS.

THE Right Honourable Earl Dudley and Ward is at it again—this time in a legitimate way. For a long time he has represented Jupiter Mammon, on whose nod ten thousand golden sovereigns wait, ready to be most potent agents, no matter for what work. We cannot argue with Jupiter Mammon; we can only despise, while we appreciate, the full force of the machinery by which he works. In the rôle of the Golden God, therefore, Lord Dudley and Ward could "—— sit in the counting-house

Counting out his money"

—10,000 sovereigns wherewith to bribe a Dean and Chapter—perfectly confident that his proceedings were open to no argument, however much they might deserve censure.

At length Lord Dudley has come to the aid of his money. This golden Count Moltke, who, from his cabinet in Park Lane, could control the movements of an army of sovereigns, has found reason to doubt the result; and, now, seizing his pen he rushes to help his glittering troops. Welcome to the field, O belted Earl!—a field whereon the humblest skirmisher and the greatest captain may meet on something like equality. We will be courteous to one so unused to paper war, and allow him to strike first. Here is a letter addressed last week to a Worcester journal:—

SIR,—I shall be much obliged to you if you will allow me to trespass on your space with a letter both this week and next, on the subject of the Restoration of the Cathedral and the future holding of the Triennial Festivals there. To day I will confine myself entirely to the arguments which have been used for their continuance, so that it may not be supposed that they are unanswerable, or even of such weight that an answer to them is difficult.

There are but two which have been put prominently forward: one being the assertion that there is no desecration of the sacred building in holding such meetings (sanctioned as they are by many who would never countenance them if they felt there was such desecration), and the other being the question of the injury which might accrue to the Charity now benefited by the proceeds of the Festivals were they discontinued.

First, then—as to the desecration of the Cathedral itself: let any one who is prepared to judge impartially ask the Chapter, the Cathedral architect, nay the vergers themselves, as to what is and must be the state of things for weeks previous to the holding of a Festival. The daily service in the nave interrupted—this and the Sunday services performed in the Lady Chapel—because all the rest of the building, nave and choir, is wanted for the music meeting.

Those who have followed the history of the Cathedral know that when the service, in which the choirs of the three cathedrals joined, first changed its character, and became a performance of sacred music by hired performers, it was held in the choir, and the service was entirely suspended. Public opinion revolted against this, and the Festivals were then held in the nave. Why? Because the nave was never used, and was thought a fitting place for such purposes. And even now, despite the fact that the nave has been for months used for Divine service, one voice is not ashamed to say that the nave is specially a fitting place for the music meetings, because Protestant worship does not require so large a space. Nay, more than this: the choir is again permitted to be used, on the avowed ground that the Festivals would not pay their expenses if all the available space were not utilized. This is a step backwards to that state of things which the better feelings of years ago condemned. To this I will only add one word more, as to the desecration of the building. The Festivals of sacred music are not services in any sense. The meeting of the choirs was so, but the present arrangements are not, and as such, I venture to say, cannot be rightfully held there. In saying this I must guard myself against being supposed to convey any reproach to those who think differently. They are undoubtedly the great majority, and their opinion carries corresponding weight with it; but the present state of things has grown up slowly, has been permitted for years, acquiesced in, and acted upon as a precedent, and cannot therefore be ignored, or supposed capable of any sudden conversion to one diametrically opposite. Though, if only from the "small still voices" which have spoken out this time, I do not in any way despair that the truer feeling as to the Cathedral will obtain in the end.

From the present permission granted by the Chapters of the three dioceses arises the question of whether they have not, by giving it, exceeded their powers as the legal guardians of their cathedrals. On this point I will say no more than beg you to print Dr. Phillimore's opinion, which I send you with this letter.

For myself I cannot understand that, on any pretext, an inhabitant of Worcester should have to pay on any occasion for entering the Cathedral doors when open.

I now come to the question of the Charity. The bread of the widow and orphan is a powerful appeal as it should be, for a greater or more worthy one cannot well be imagined; but will no one subscribe for so holy a cause, unless they have been gratified by hearing an oratorio beautifully performed? Is it only then that they are alive to the claim which the widows and orphans of deceased clergymen of the diocese have upon them? Do those who lay most stress upon this argument know that the Charity has a large sum laid by, the interest of which is available as long as the claim exists, or there are found recipients of it?

If the old service as performed by the united choirs is restored, cannot all give who feel for the position of those for whom their gifts are asked, or am I to believe that on these terms they will not give, though the Charity is made the one plea for continuing to raise money in the Cathedral?

I shall have tired your patience and that of anyone who may read this letter, but I must resume for one moment what I have said in so many words:—First, the Cathedral ought not to be used for the Festival; and secondly, it cannot legally be used for such purposes; thirdly, the Widows' and Orphans' Charity will suffer but slightly, if at all, from the opinion becoming general that the great city church is no longer the fitting place for the performance of oratorios, however glorious they may be in composition, however sacred the words, however perfect the execution.

And now, Sir, with trust that this all important subject will excuse my thus trespassing on your space, I am, your obliged and obedient servant, DUDLEY.

Dudley House, Park Lane, Thursday, March 24, 1870.

Briefly, Lord Dudley argues thus:—1st, The Cathedral is now desecrated; 2nd, Stop the desecration, and the Charity will not suffer. What Lord Dudley means by "desecration" is not very clearly set forth. From one paragraph we gather that "desecration" means removing the daily service into the Lady Chapel, "because all the rest of the building, nave and choir, is wanted for the music meeting." Here, truly, is a curious notion as to how a sacred building may be unsanctified. By what mysterious ordinance does a service in the Lady Chapel deconsecrate the body of the Cathedral? Let the noble writer explain. Further on we learn that "desecration" means doing anything within the Cathedral which is not a service. This definition, however, is somewhat weakened by an admission that it may be rejected without reproach. But granting its correctness—which we do only for the sake of argument—may we ask Lord Dudley why he confines his energies to the Festivals? He knows very well that English cathedrals are not only churches but show places, wherein the chink of admission money directly precedes and follows the pealing of the organ. Let him be up and doing against this form of "desecration," and we shall have more faith in his consistency.

On the question of possible results to the Charity, Lord Dudley can only prophesy as common men prophesy—that is, without the infallibility of a Divine commission. He looks into the future, and beholds the Charity prospering in the absence of Festivals;—we look into the future and behold it sending round the hat in vain. Our vision is, at least, as substantial as Lord Dudley's. A coronet has not the gift, accredited to ear-rings,—of improving one's eye-sight.

Another matter is spoken of in Lord Dudley's letter—the legality of the Festivals; and the letter itself is accompanied—as a sort of threat, we presume—by an "opinion" emanating from Dr. Phillimore. Here is the document:—

CASE SUBMITTED TO COUNSEL IN 1865.

The See of Worcester is one which, after the dissolution of monasteries by Henry the VIIIth, was refounded by that monarch for a bishop, dean, archdeacon, prebendaries, minor canons, and other members. The Cathedral has become much dilapidated, and recently very liberal contributions towards its restoration have been made by the nobility and gentry resident in the county and the public generally. Many parties entertain a very strong objection to the holding of musical festivals in cathedrals, considering that the charitable objects to which the funds collected at such meetings are devoted do not compensate for what is considered to be a desecration by such performances, and remonstrances have been made to induce the Dean and Chapter of Worcester to refuse to allow the Triennial Festival to be held in their Cathedral. The hours for Divine service in the Cathedral on week-days are at 8 and 10 a.m., and 3 p.m., at which the admission into the Cathedral is free to any person wishing to attend. The musical festivals are held in the nave. The opinion of the Queen's Advocate-General is requested:—

1st.—Whether the Dean and Chapter can legally exclude the public from the Cathedral, unless upon the production of a ticket or paying money for admission, during those hours on week-days ordinarily set apart for the celebration of the Services of the Church.

2nd.—Whether the Dean and Chapter are legally entitled to require, or to depute to third parties, such as the Committee of Musical Festivals, the right to require persons seeking admission to the Cathedral during the hours ordinarily devoted to the celebration of the Services of the Church, or at any other times, to produce a ticket or to pay money as a condition for such admission.

3rd.—Assuming your opinion in answer to either of the above questions to be adverse to the Dean and Chapter, what proceeding, and against whom, and at whose suit, can the right of the public as opposed to the claims of the Committees of Musical Festivals or of the Dean and Chapter, either in person making such claims or authorising them to be made by the committees, be legally contested?

OPINION.

After much consideration I am unable to understand how it can be legally competent to any Dean and Chapter of the Church of England to allow a musical festival wholly unconnected with the Service of the Church to be celebrated in their Cathedral. I have always thought that the services contained in the Prayer-book, together with the sermon and anthems and hymns which the Prayer-book contemplates as being incorporated with the morning and daily prayer, are the only services which can, according to law, be performed in any consecrated church. Such appears to me to be the clear result of the statutes, the rubrics, the general ecclesiastical law, and, I presume, of the statutes of the Cathedral applicable to this subject.

The consequences which would flow from the adoption of any principl which would vest in the Dean and Chapter the power of allowing other services than those prescribed by law to be celebrated in the Cathedral, appear to be very grave.

One Dean and Chapter may consider that a service exclusively composed of religious music, in which the performers are vocalists distinguished for their talents at the operas or the theatres in London conduces to the spiritual edification of the hearers, and is a lawful means of obtaining money for any religious purpose. Another Dean and Chapter may think that the representation of a religious drama, such as the Samson Agonistes of Milton, or the David of Mrs. Hannah More, may tend still more to the promotion of religion, and be an equally lawful means of obtaining money for religious objects. The representation of such dramas would of course be rendered as perfect as possible by obtaining the aid of distinguished professional actors. It is difficult to see upon what principle this latter use of the Cathedral can be prohibited, if the former can be permitted by law. Indeed the argument might be pushed still further than this; but I forbear to do so.

It would seem to me to be the duty of the visitor of the Cathedral, who, I presume, is the Bishop of the diocese, upon a proper representation being made to him, to admonish the Dean and Chapter that to allow a musical festival wholly unconnected with, and forming no part of the proper services of the day, to be celebrated at all in the Cathedral, was contrary to law; and if the admonition, which one can scarcely suppose, was disregarded, to visit with proper censures those who had set his authority and that of the law at nought.

Of course if the musical festival were substituted for, or prevented in any way, the appointed services of the day, the offence would be of a still graver character.

It may be competent to the Dean and Chapter for good reasons to alter the hours of Divine service; but it is not competent to them to exclude anybody in the diocese from attending Divine service in the Cathedral, which is the mother church of the diocese, or to make the payment of a sum of money the condition, without the fulfilment of which he is not permitted to enter for this purpose the doors of the Cathedral.

October 11, 1865. ROBERT PHILLIMORE.

Our remarks on this need only be brief. Dr. Phillimore's "opinion," as an answer to Lord Dudley's questions, is worth simply nothing. Here is the whole "case," stripped of Lord's and Lawyer's superfluous verbiage:—

Q. Can the Dean and Chapter exclude the public, or make them pay for admission during ordinary service hours?

A. They can neither prevent nor charge for attendance on divine service (which they don't attempt) but they can alter the hours of service (which they do).

Q. Can the Dean and Chapter grant to others the power above named?

No answer.

Q. Who may prosecute the Dean and Chapter for permitting the Festivals.

A. The Bishop may admonish, and then censure—if he thinks fit.

Lord Dudley may consider his fee well spent; but to us the lawyer's document seems hardly worth the paper it is written upon; especially inasmuch as it discusses matters outside the questions submitted—with all the one-sidedness of a retained counsel.

Lord Dudley threatens another letter. We are glad of it. The more he writes the better for the Festivals.

OCCASIONAL NOTES.

THE following paragraph appeared in the Athenæum of last Saturday:—

"Mdme. Arabella Goddard has been engaged as solo pianist at the Birmingham Festival. She leaves England in the autumn for a lengthened professional tour in Germany and France. Germany has sent us plenty of eminent pianists; we are now able to return the favour in a manner quite satisfactory to our own amour-propre."

We feel sure that the opinion of our distinguished contemporary is shared by all to whom native talent, as such, is not a bugbear.

A CORRESPONDENT ("M. R. W.") inquires our opinion as to whether an English composer ever wrote a good organ fugue. The question is wide; but we have no hesitation in saying that one of the best written organ fugues to which we have seen an English name attached is that signed "Henry W. Goodban," in the last number of the Choir, March 20, 1870 (a fugue in D minor, in which, at bar 49, a masterly augmentation of the theme will be observed). Henceforth, if Mr. "H. W. G." proceeds in this manner, he may fairly lay claim to the title of the English "J. S. H."

"SOME years ago" (says Volket's Aria) "a strolling tumbler used to go about the streets of Stockholm, performing feats of strength for children and servants. His whole scenery consisted in a mat he spread on the pavement, on which, in a pair of thread-bare tights, he astonished the spectators, who, like other persons of distinction, paid entrée à discrétion. But he was not alone. On the same stage a sweet little girl appeared, who was to be educated as artist in the same line, and performed a graceful pas-seul during the entr'acte of her father's fatiguing antics. Many had great sympathy for the lovely child when, on raw, autumnal evenings, or in the cold days of winter, clad in thin, miserable finery, she capered in the open air. But, although there was compassion enough among the spectators, it was a long time before anyone with the power to follow his own inclination saw her. But at last her hour of redemption came. Princess Eugénie, sister of Charles XV., heard of all this by some means or other, and took care of her, and, as it proved that she had a fine voice and talent for music, she received instruction of the professor who formerly taught Jenny Lind. All this happened several years since. Her name is Amalia Riego, and, on Monday last she gave a concert in Stockholm."

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

That the "Coalition" has come to an end, and that, for this season at any rate, we are to have two Italian Operas, one at Covent Garden, and the other at Drury Lane (as in 1868), is pretty generally known to those among our readers who interest themselves in such matters. Messrs. Gye and Mapleson continue joint directors of the Royal Italian Opera, while the new enterprise, advertised as "Italian Opera, Drury Lane," is the undertaking of Mr. George Wood, a gentleman well known to the musical world. Whatever the risks of the speculating parties on either side, that the opera-going public will profit by the change can hardly admit of a doubt.

Messrs. Gye and Mapleson are first in the field. They opened their theatre on Tuesday night, with a programme sufficiently tempting to draw a crowded and brilliant audience, although the opera selected was what, under any other than exceptional circumstances, might fairly be styled the "hackneyed" Lucia di Lammermoor. But only let some new prima donna of capacity be put forward as the heroine, and Donizetti's Lucia invariably proves attractive. This was satisfactorily shown on the present occasion, when a young Austrian (or for the matter of that Austro-Italian) singer, her birthplace being Trieste, appeared as Lucia. Mdlle. Sessi has sung in Germany, in Italy, and quite recently in France, where, at the Paris Opéra Italien, she had to fill the place (no grateful task) of Madame Adelina Patti, during the engagement of that wonderfully popular artist at the Imperial Opera in St. Petersburgh. That she should have succeeded in doing this with a certain amount of credit says no little in the favour of one as yet so inexperienced. Like Adelina Patti, however, Mdlle. Sessi—a pupil, we understand, of Herr Maurice Strakosch—has enjoyed uncommon advantages. At any rate, judging from Tuesday night's performance, her first essay before the most difficult, because, perhaps, the most blasé, audience in Europe, was one of such promise that we can safely predict for her an honourable career. Let us say at once that Mdlle. Sessi shines far more as a singer than as an actress; but, calling to mind the many notable instances of operatic aspirants who began by singing more or less well, and took long years to master that scarcely less essential accomplishment which leads to undisputed eminence on the lyric stage, we have no reason to doubt that time will bring what is at present wanting to the dramatic side of her art. She has even now both earnestness and intelligence; but more than this is indispensable to make a genuine actress, and it remains with herself to acquire the rest. Mdlle. Sessi is petite in stature; nor does her facial physiognomy appear to lend itself readily to mobility of expression. Admitting this, however, together with other physical conditions, apparently drawbacks, there remains an indefinable something which justifies a belief in future progress. A good deal has been said in Parisian circles about Mdlle. Sessi's "blonde chevelure," as a peculiar and, indeed, extraordinary characteristic of her individuality, but, while no one could be blind to its profuse abundance, we should be sorry to have to record that, not merely upon this alone, but upon this in particular, the strong impression created on Tuesday night by the new-comer, in the scene of Lucia's madness—perhaps her most forcible—depended. That it lent a certain picturesque illusion to the dramatic situation is unquestionable; but that it went for anything more we are not disposed to admit.

Mdlle. Sessi's voice is a pure soprano, especially telling in the higher register, and therefore favourable to the effective enunciation of such music as that which Donizetti has put into the mouth of his romantic heroine. This was evident in her very first scene, where the familiar "Regnava nel silenzio," with its no less familiar "cabaletta," would, but for a certain nervousness of delivery, under the circumstances intelligible enough, have left little to desire; and scarcely less so in the duet ("Sulla tomba") with Edgardo. In the first we remarked some "staccato" passages, with certain embellishments in the second verse of the "cabaletta," very much resembling those to which, in her earlier time, Madame Adelina Patti used to accustom us; in the last we were struck by a physical force, which not even the stentorian tones of her partner, Herr Wachtel, the Edgardo of the evening, could overpower. The "Contract Scene"—allowing for a seemingly prevalent want of dramatic perception—had also excellent points, and more especially in the septet with chorus, "Chi mi frena," following immediately upon the unexpected apparition of Edgardo, in which the concluding high notes were given out by Mdlle. Sessi with a force entirely equal to the requirements of that justly famous concerted piece. The mad scene, as we have already hinted, was her most striking display; and we have only to add that some of her passages in the final movement—"Spargi di qualche pianto"—were both new and effective. That Mdlle. Sessi thoroughly satisfied the audience may be gathered from the fact that she was called for enthusiastically at the end of each of her principal scenes. Her future progress will be watched with interest.

Herr Wachtel's Edgardo is precisely what it was when he first played the character with Madame (then Mdlle.) Patti in 1864; the voice as resonant and powerful as ever; the singing as vigorous and original. Of Signor Graziani's Enrico we have spoken so often that it will suffice to say that he has never given the music with more earnestness, or made more strenuous endeavours to impart his idea of dramatic significance to the character. Signor Capponi was very good as Raimondo (Bilde-the-Bent); and Signor Marino, who possesses a voice worth cultivating, excellent as Arturo. The chorus (allowing for a single "slip" unnecessary to specify) was efficient; and the admirable manner in which the orchestral accompaniments were played showed that in Signor Vianesi, from St. Petersburgh (who may be remembered in England some ten years ago), the directors of the Royal Italian Opera have secured the services of a really competent conductor.

The opera, which was preceded by the National Anthem (chorus and orchestra), was warmly received throughout.

Lucia was repeated on Thursday; and to-night Mdlle. Tietjens will appear as Valentine in the Huguenots of Meyerbeer.

The arrangements for the season having been fully made known in our advertising columns, it is only requisite to call attention to a special feature of the prospectus. Of the varied and extensive repertory, to which the directors refer with pardonable pride, we need say nothing. The operatic public is well acquainted with it, and is doubtless grateful for past recollections. The operas positively to be given in the course of the season include two bond fide novelties, and one work at least new to Covent Garden. The bona fide novelties are Signor Verdi's Macbeth, an opera seria, though often talked about, never yet heard in England; and Signor Campana's Esmeralda, which, if report may be credited, has lately been performed with great success at the Imperial Opera of St. Petersburgh. In the former the chief characters —Macbeth and Lady Macbeth—are assigned to Signor Graziani and Mdlle. Tietjens; in the latter (founded upon M. Victor Hugo's famous historical romance), the part of the heroine is to be sustained by Madame Adelina Patti—who if any singer could make old amateurs of the ballet forget Carlotta Grisi in the same creation, is precisely the one.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—The concert this afternoon, for a reason unnecessary to explain to amateurs, is to be devoted exclusively to the works of Beethoven. That on Monday evening is for the benefit of Madame Arabella Goddard—her last appearance for the season. The programme on Monday is rich in attractions—for particulars of which our advertising columns may be consulted. Not the least attraction is the "Kreutzer Sonata" of Beethoven, to be played by our great English pianist, in association with the greatest of living violinists.

THE ORATORIO CONCERTS.—Bach's sacred oratorio, The Passion, will be performed, for the fourth time in London, at Exeter Hall, on Wednesday evening next, April 6th, under the direction of Mr. Barnby. The band and chorus is to be largely increased; and the performance promises to be in every way worthy of this sublime work.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

The following was the programme of Saturday's concert:—

Overture, Leonora, No. 1	...	...	...	...	Beethoven.
Scena, Medea—Madame Rudersdorff	...	...	...	...	Randegger.
Symphony, "Approach of Spring"	...	...	...	...	Hiller.
Arietta, "In Questa Tomba"—Madame Patey	...	...	...	...	Beethoven.
Adagio and Rondo for violin and orchestra—Herr Franz Ries	...	...			F. Ries.
Aria, "Dir Danken Wir"—Madame Rudersdorff	...	...			Mozart.
Song, "When sorrow steepeth"—Madame Patey	...	...			Land.
Overture, Jubilee	...	...	...	...	Weber.

With reference to the first Fidelio overture, "G." remarks:—"It is much to be regretted that so fine a composition, so abounding in beauties, should remain comparatively unknown." "G." is right, undoubtedly; but the fact he laments is not surprising. The great Leonora kills its three companions, just as the great Pyramid kills the lesser ones, or as Mont Blanc throws into shade the peaks upon which it looks down. Most of all does this apply to No. 1, because the first of four attempts to accomplish an object is naturally regarded as least successful. Nevertheless, the overture is a charming composition, worthy to prelude the glorious lyric drama after the name of which it is called. We are told that it was "probably brought over by Mendelssohn with the great symphony in C of Schubert." The italics are ours, and must be taken to signify that an event so interesting ought to be placed beyond doubt one way or the other. Ferdinand Hiller's symphony, the one dedicated by him to the late Musical Society of London, was a welcome appearance. It deserves an occasional place in orchestral programmes, and can hardly fail to gratify the audience by whom it is heard. Gratification was specially marked on Saturday, for reasons obvious to all. In the first place the music was admirably played. Next, its subject is all the more agreeable when Spring is very near and snow covers the ground. Lastly, its merits came upon the audience as a surprise. It is evident that the subject he sought to illustrate was adapted to Herr Hiller's idiosyncrasy. We all know what sentiment—sentiment never mawkish, because controlled by poetic taste—distinguishes this excellent master's works. For this characteristic "The return of Spring" gave full scope, of which every advantage has been taken. In the opening movement the struggle between Winter and Spring is expressed with happy facility, and with a plainness nobody can mistake. After the agitated, we had almost said spasmodic, first theme, the lovely cantabile of the second came like bright sunshine after storm and gloom. The next movement expresses transition; and its pervading calm, broken only here and there, is made even more welcome by subjects the pastoral character of which is in the best keeping. Mr. Mauna has styled the third movement "a picture of a moonlight night in early Spring, full of grace and beauty,"—an interpretation with which we are far from disposed to quarrel. By many this movement is accounted the best in the work; but, whether the best or not, nobody can dispute that it deserves a very high rank. There is a charm about the music only at the command of a master. In the finale we have Spring, uncontested and unclouded; and the idea is put forward in a manner not to be mistaken. To sum up, let us say that Herr Hiller's symphony is a fine and masterly work, honourable to the worker in the highest degree. Herr Franz Ries did not appear to much advantage as a composer; but his playing has merits, of which, however, we must make a final estimate upon closer acquaintance. The young German was recalled. About Weber's Jubilee we need not speak. Herr Randegger's fine scena had another great success—thanks partly to its indisputable excellence, and partly to the magnificent singing of Madame Rudersdorff. The composer himself conducted, and, with the executant, was recalled amid hearty applause. Mozart's air is, of course, charming, and was admirably delivered. Madame Patey obtained an encore for Land's song, a result due, we should say, to her excellent singing. T. E.

Moscow.—M. Gounod's Romeo e Giuletta was produced for the benefit of Mad. Artôt-Padilla. The house was crowded, and the fair bénéficiaire, overwhelmed with applause and valuable presents, including silver tea-pots, turquoise ear-rings, ruby brooches, and such like. Mad. Artôt-Padilla and her husband are now at Warsaw, where they are engaged for a month.

CONCERTS VARIOUS.

The second concert of the Schubert Society took place on Thursday, 24th March. Schumann's Fantasies-tucke for pianoforte and violin opened the concert, played by Herr Schrattenholz and Herr Jung. The other instrumental pieces were "Des Abends" and "Novelletten" (Miss Lucy M'Manus), and solo violoncello, "Abendlied," played with much feeling by Herr Schuberth. Mdlle. Bavant sang "Du Ringan meinem Finga," and Mdlle. Zernial, "Die Grenadiere" and "My Highlands." The second part was miscellaneous, opening with Mozart's charming trio in G (Op. 30), played by Herr Schrattenholz, Herr Jung, and Herr Schuberth. A great feature, earning much applause, was Gounod's Meditation on the first prelude of Bach, played by Herr Schuberth, accompanied on the piano and harmonium. Herr Jung's solo on the violin—Variations on Russian airs—was very well executed. Miss M'Manus and Herr Schrattenholz each played a solo on the pianoforte. The vocal part included an old song by Henry Purcell, "A jewel is my lady fair," sung by Mr. Dawson; "Will he come" (Sullivan), Mdlle. Zernial; and "Orage fire" (Marras), Mdlle. Bavant. Mr. Benedict, Herr Schrattenholz, and Herr Schuberth were the conductors. The third concert, devoted to Spohr, will take place on Thursday, April 28.

Mr. Alfred Gilbert and Madame Gilbert have commenced their fourth season of the "Classics of the Pianoforte," at the Conduit Street Rooms. The second of the present series took place on Wednesday evening, when Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Dussek, Steibelt, Dohnanyi, &c., were represented, both instrumentally and vocally, in the programme—Bach by an air, "My heart ever faithful," etc.; Mozart by "Voi che sapete" and "The Violet" (encored); Beethoven by his grand trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, in D (Op 70, No. 1); his sonata for piano alone, in E flat (Op. 29, No. 3); his Romance in G (Op. 40), for violin, and his cantata, Adelaida; Dussek by "Name the glad day; and Bennett by his Chamber Trio in A (Op. 26), for piano, violin, and violoncello, and his Sonata duo in A (Op. 32), for piano and violoncello. The instrumental executants were Mr. Alfred Gilbert (piano), Mr. Henry Holmes (violin), and Signor Piatti (violoncello). The vocalists were Madame Gilbert, Miss Susannah Cole, and Mr. George Perren. Two compositions by modern composers were introduced on the occasion—a vocal terzetto by Signor Costa, "Vanne a colei," and an offertorium by Mr. Mooral, the latter charmingly sung by Madame Gilbert. Mr. Frank Muri was announced to accompany the vocal music.

St. George's Hall was well attended last Thursday week by an audience interested in listening to the performances of Mr. and Mrs. Richard Blagrove. The concertina, in the hands of Mr. Richard Blagrove, seems capable of interpreting music of pretension, and the selection made for these concerts embraces sonatas, trios, quartets, and other chamber compositions, as well as lighter effusions. In the lighter styles of composition the peculiarities of the instrument are charmingly displayed by Mr. Blagrove. The pianoforte playing of Mrs. Richard Blagrove is remarkable. The performances were varied by Mr. Henry Blagrove as violinist, and Mr. Aylward as violoncellist. The vocal music was sung by Madame Talbot-Cherer, Miss Robertine Henderson, Mr. Carter, and Mr. Winn. The fourth concert is announced to take place this month, under the patronage of the Princess Teck.

MR. HENRY LESLIE'S CONCERTS.

The second of these admirable entertainments was given in St. James's Hall on Thursday week, and proved to be of more than average attraction. Mozart's overture to Zauberflöte headed the programme, as though to tempt an audience, for once, into the exercise of that rare virtue among audiences—punctuality. How the music was played by an excellent orchestra we need not stop to describe. Next came Bach's fine motet for double choir, "I wrestle and pray;" the great ingenuity and power of which could hardly have had a better exemplification. Mr. Leslie's Choir was evidently on its mettle in attacking the great master's work, and fairly conquered every difficulty. Need we say that those among the audience who had learned to appreciate Bach were delighted. Mendelssohn's concerto for violin closed the first part, and—the player being Herr Joachim—closed it brilliantly. Herr Joachim's performance of this fine work, and the work itself, are so well known that we are not called upon for an elaborate notice. Every amateur will understand how grandly the first and third movements were executed, and what a depth of expression was manifested in the lovely andante. The second part opened with Beethoven's fifth symphony (C minor), which was given with great vigour and effect. But music so familiar could scarcely be otherwise rendered. Of course it was heard with pleasure from beginning to end. When will the people ever tire of it? The next piece, Mendelssohn's psalm, "Judge me, O God," was doubly welcome. In the first place it belongs to the finest order of sacred music; and, next, it is invariably sung to perfection by Mr. Leslie's Choir. Those who have so heard it can never forget that grand unison which seems one, not to voices, but a voice; such is the precision attained. The psalm was encored as usual, and with the usual good reason. Spohr's favourite adagio, from the ninth concerto for violin, was played by Herr Joachim as no one else plays it, many as are the artists who make the movement a stock piece. This, too, was encored, amid hearty and demonstrative applause. The concert ended with "The Hunt's Up," from Macfarren's May Day, a piece the excellence of which we have had recent occasion to point out.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

At the Students' Concert, on Thursday evening, the following instrumental and vocal pieces were given:—

Fantasie-stück, Pianoforte (Max Bruch); Mr. Donee. Glee, "Thyrsis when he left me" (Callcutt); Miss Goode, Miss Etherington, Mr. Shakespeare, and Mr. Parry. Recit. ed Aria, "Bella mia fiamma addio," "Resta o Cara" (Mozart); Miss Pocklington. Largo e Mesto, Minuetto and Rondo, Allegro, from Sonata in D, No. 3, Op. 10, Pianoforts (Beethoven); Mr. Beazley. Cradle Song, "Peacefully Slumber" (A. Randegger); Miss Rebecca Jewell. Pas Triste, pas Gai, Pianoforte (W. S. Bennett); Master Walker. Motett, for female voices, "The Lord is my Shepherd" (Hullah); Sell, Miss Rebecca Jewell, Miss Goode, and Miss C. Gardner. Aria, "O Salutaris." Messe Solennelle (Rossini); Miss Waite and Master Parker. Trio, "Sun-rise" (H. Smart); Miss Ferrari, Miss Rebecca Jewell, and Miss Marian Severn. Andante and Variations in B flat, two Pianofortes (Schumann); Miss Westmarland, and Miss C. Gardner. Songs, "The Farewell," "The Post horn" (Schubert); Miss Goode. Etude, in B flat minor, Two Sketches in B flat and G minor, Pianoforte (Mendelssohn); Miss Linda Scates. Madrigal, "Cynthia, thy Song" (Giovanni Croce, 1560).

The accompanists of the vocal music were Miss Channell, Miss Townsend, and Mr. Shakespeare.

The "features" of the concert were Signor Randegger's "Peacefully Slumber," sung with expression by Miss Rebecca Jewell; Professor Bennett's "Pas triste, pas gai," cleverly played by a very young pianist—Master Walker; the "O Salutaris" from Rossini's Messe Solennelle, well suited to Miss Severn's fine voice; Henry Smart's beautiful trio, "Sun-rise," effectively sung by Misses Ferrari, Rebecca Jewell, and Severn; and Mendelssohn's Etude and Sketches, capitally played by Miss Linda Scates. The movements from Mozart's Sonata, by Miss Waite and Master Parker, would have pleased more had the young violinist brought his instrument into better tune; and Schumann's duet, well played by the two young students, would also have pleased more had it been less monotonous.

The next Public Rehearsal will take place on Tuesday morning, April 12.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

The performance of Beethoven's Mass in D is always an event in musical annals, and the Sacred Harmonic Society may be congratulated on the success of its exertions on Friday evening week, when the work was given with singular effect under the admirable direction of Sir Michael Costa. The great merit of the performance was the marvellous execution of the instrumental portion. That the vocalization was less perfect may be easily understood and accounted for. The soprani failed the most, and unless a choir of high voices alone be selected to sing such music the painful exertions necessary to bring out the notes above the staff will always militate against the enjoyment of this great work.

The solo singers were Mdlle. Enequist, Madame Patey, whose beautiful voice, and musician-like style proclaim her one of the best contraltos of the day; Mr. Vernon Rigby, tenor; and Mr. Patey, bass. To Sir Michael Costa the highest praise is due for such a performance.

Barcelona.—A new Italian opera, L'Orfanella, has been produced very successfully at the Liceo. The music is by Sig. Baraldi, the baritone, who sustains a buffo part in his own work.

Bremen.—Weinlich's "Lady-Orchestra" ("Damen-Orchestra") has been giving concerts with great success. The envious and malignant, that is to say: Instrumental performers of the male sex who never drew themselves, hint that the nine young ladies constituting the "Orchestra," owe no small part of their triumph to their good looks. Well, what if they do? Why should not beauty be allied with an instrumental performance, just as much as fine scenery, on Herr Wagner's plan, with operatic singing?

Apropos of the revival of Robert at the Grand Opéra, it is said that bouquets and crowns of flowers were so piled at the foot of the cross in the third act, as to interfere with the stage business. Some time ago we called attention to the progress of classical vocal music in Manchester. We have now to add that at a recent concert of the Vocal Society, Wesley's In Exitu Israel, and Bach's Motet, Be not afraid, were conspicuous features. There is reason to believe that Londoners underrate musical progress in our great provincial towns.

A correspondent of the Church Review supplies a melancholy statement with reference to churches in the most rural portions of the diocese of Chichester. In one district none of the churches have organs, many have no music or instrument whatever; and at J—— the bells are sold to repair the tower. If this is true, the new Bishop, who, we believe, likes good music, will have an open field before him.—Choir.

Mr. Babington, late of St. Mary's Redcliffe, Bristol, finds Church music at Barbadoes in a very unsatisfactory state. The St. Leonard's choir has, owing to the harshness of the curate, nearly broken up. Dr. Parry, Bishop of the diocese, has just died in England.—Choir.

A leading article in the Standard of March 25th begins as follows:—

"That terrible French romancer, M. Théophile Gautier, whose freedom of treatment in dealing with the most exciting incidents of human life renders his writing as a rule so eminently ill-adapted for the family circle, once wrote a novel called Les Memoires du Diable."

The living "terrible French romancer" has also enough to answer for without crediting him with those of the dead "terrible French romancer," Frederic Soulié.

Three "Chamber Concerts of Modern Music" are in progress under the direction of Mr. W. Coenen. The composers who filled the first evening were Raff, Max Bruch, and Carl Grädener. The trio by the first-named—notwithstanding his reputed sympathy with Wagner,—the quartet by the second—a pupil of the thoroughly conservative Hiller,—nor the quintet of the last-named—of whom we know nothing,—showed any remarkable traits of eccentricity, extravagance, or indeed of originality. If these concerts are intended to be propagandist, the selections might be better considered.—The Musician.

Thus pleasantly writes the Paris correspondent of the Daily Telegraph about certain entertainments annually due at Mi carême:—

"To-night there will be bals masqués in every place où l'on danse, as well as in those private houses where dancing is not the every-day occupation of the inmates. Even now, as I write, while it is still broad daylight, and in spite of the rain which has just set in, the masques are beginning to promenade the boulevards. They do not look too cheerful now; but, as the small hours approach nearer and nearer, they will get up a noisy, sham enthusiasm, which will pass muster for the real thing. What mad fun there will be to-night! What headaches there will be to-morrow; and what fluxions de poitrine on the following day!"

At an early hour on Saturday morning Mrs. Albert Smith, the widow of the popular author and entertainer, whom she had outlived nearly ten years, somewhat suddenly expired. Mrs. Albert Smith was the eldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Keeley, and as Miss Mary Keeley her name will be remembered in association with many notable theatrical successes achieved at the Lyceum and the Adelphi. Her first appearance was made at the Lyceum Theatre, December 20, 1845, in a dramatic adaptation of Mr. Charles Dickens's story, The Cricket on the Hearth. Her marriage with Mr. Albert Smith took place on the 1st of August, 1859, on the completion of the first season of the lively lecturer's entertainment, "China," and in the May following the young wife became unhappily a widow.

In the official analysis of Mr. Edward Mollenhauer's new symphony, The Passions, it is said—" The composer has treated fear as a haunting presence; as a shadow which ever pursues and chills the heart, holding it, as it were, in a vacuum, while its dull throbs are as the dropping of lead." A New York paper calls this "a chemical description."

As an example of American laudation we take the following from a Louisville paper:—"When Miss Dawson first appeared, her bright eyes, and lovely face attracted everybody. But when her beautiful pearly teeth were disclosed, there came such a cataract of diamond-drops of melody that the house seemed, as it were, deluged in a spray of harmony equal to that which one might imagine would come from a Niagara composed of Æolian harps."

The fertility of English novelists has often been animadverted upon in the German press; but what is to be said of an authoress (Mrs. or Miss Kathinka Lütz) who, under the name of K. Th. Lianikka, is about to publish twenty-eight volumes all at once? Kollmann of Leipsic advertises as "nearly ready" the following new productions of her pen:—The Romance of a Poet's (Goethe's) Life, in three divisions and eleven volumes; Henry Heine, the Lyric Poet, in three divisions and also in eleven volumes; and Rahel; or, Thirty three Years of a Noble Woman's Life, in three divisions and six volumes. These twenty-eight volumes are advertised at 13½ thalers; but taken en bloc, the publisher offers them at 6 thalers, or only 18s. 1

Statesman and politicians are apt to take, and we think justly, a lofty view of their labours, and if the following letter, said to have been addressed by Lamartine to Count d'Orsay, and now published for the first time, be authentic, it may be regarded as supporting this view, and as little complimentary to the great dandy. The letter is as follows:—

"Thanks, cher ami, for the beautiful hound you have sent me. I do not hide the fact. I have always been extravagantly fond of well-bred dogs. Do you ask why? For four reasons:—1st. Because they are beautiful. 2nd. Because they are faithful. 3rd. Because they do not meddle with politics. And 4th. In short, because they are dogs. If men could but unite all these conditions I would rave about them also, but—happily, I may make an exception in your favour, cher ami."

Among the false legends of history rank one long current respecting Maria Theresa and Madame de Pompadour. The Empress-Queen never wrote the letters beginning "Ma cousine" or "Ma très chère sœur." She denies it in a letter to the Electoral Princess Maria-Antonia of Saxony, published by Dr. Carl von Weber in 1857:—

"Vous nous trompez si vous croyez que nous avons jamais eut des liaison avec la Pompadour, jamais une lettre, ni que notre ministre aye passé pas son canal; ils ont été lui faire la reverence tout les fois entrées, mais jamais aucune intimité. Ce canal ne m'aurait pas convenu. Je lui ais fais un present plutot galant que magnifique, l'année 1756, et avec la permission du roy, je ne la crois pas capable d'en accepter autrement."

Why does Carlyle take no notice of this disclaimer? The story was one of Frederick II.'s calumnies. Carlyle owns that the notes had never been printed, "or given at least to the Museums."

MUSICAL EVENTS IN BOSTON.—The Russian Troupe have given several concerts. M. W. Whitney had a complimentary benefit at Chickering's Hall, March 1st; J. C. D. Parker, Listemann, Mrs. Barry and the Chickering Club assisted. There is to be a grand musical festival next summer, which is expected to surpass the great Jubilee. March 3rd, the ninth symphony concert at Music Hall—Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony. The Harvard Musical Society give two symphony concerts in March, the first on the 24th, to consist mostly of the writings of Beethoven, for the benefit of the Boston Art Museum; the other on the 31st, compliamtary to their estimable director, Carl Zerrahn. The Mercantile Library Association will celebrate its fiftieth anniversary at Music Hall, March 11th, by addresses from the Governor, the Mayor and Mr Wintrop, &c., and a grand concert by eminent solo talent, a large orchestra and chorus from the Handel and Haydn Society.

We are sorry to have to record the death of Mr. Charles Green, the veteran aëronaut. To him we owe the introduction of ordinary coal gas for the inflation of balloons. Before his time balloons were inflated either with artificially heated air, or else with hydrogen gas obtained by a very costly chemical process. Mr. Green, indeed, did more than anyone else to perfect the science of aëronautics, which is comparatively of very recent date. The first balloon ascent was made by de Rosiers, in 1783, and the idea of employing balloons for purposes of scientific investigation was not hit upon until 1803, when Messrs. Robertson and Lhoest ascended at Hamburg. Mr. Green was employed for scientific purposes by the British Association in 1847-1849. But he is most famous for his grand ascent in 1836, when he started from Vauxhall Gardens, and landed at Weilburg, in Nassau, accomplishing in 18 hours a journey of 500 miles. Mr. Green is also well known to all readers of Mr. Dickens; "Vauxhall Gardens" by Day," is one of the most amusing "Sketches by Boz." What aëronauts may yet accomplish cannot safely be predicted. Balloons were used as a means of strategical observation in the seven weeks' campaign of 1859, and Messrs. Glaisher and Coxwell have shown us that they can be put to good service in the interests of science. But, to whatever pitch of perfection aëronautics may be carried, the names of Charles Green and of his balloon the Nassau will be handed down to memory amongst aëronauts, as are the names of George Stephenson and his engine, the Rocket, amongst engineers.—Daily Telegraph.

We take a lively example of musical reviewing from the St. Louis Freemason:—

"'Beautiful Bells.'—Somebody who never saw the ocean, and never got sea sick, once made a goose of himself and wrote a song called 'A Life on the Ocean Wave,' &c., which does very well for love-sick swains to sing to their sweethearts when taking a ride on a duck-pond; and just so, somebody who never lived within a mile of church got off a parody on common sense inditing some lines to the 'Beautiful Bells.' This bell business is the grandest humbug in the world. We live across the street from a convent, and they have a bell which commences ringing at 4½ a.m. and rings every quarter of an hour until 8 p.m. To help the bell business a little, a church one square off has bought a large bell and had it blessed and consecrated, and they are so proud of it that it sends forth an unearthly sound every time a saint is supposed to turn round or confer a benediction; and between the two, one has about as much chance for a sleep in the morning as a short-tail cow in flytime. Our opinion of the whole performance is, that it is an unmitigated nuisance, and should be abolished by law, 'without benefit of clergy.' It did very well to have church bells in an age when nobody had a clock or carried watches, just as private seals were of some use when even the nobility were so ignorant that they could not write their names, but had to make their mark. We believe in bells to tell where the fires are, and also in steam-whistles on engines; but apart from them, we protest against the whole scheme of keeping an entire city awake just to let us know that somebody is praying—a devotion that should be performed in silence, without making such a racket and publication of the fact. If we had the matter of 'Beautiful Bells' in our custody, we could put him or her where he or she would in forty-eight hours repent in sackcloth and ashes for ever having perpetrated such nonsense."

With reference to Mr. Maretzek's attempt at Italian Opera in New York, the Atlas says:—

"The fate of the Tower of Babel has befallen the polyglot opera. It is suspended, and the wonderful crowd of all nations and nationalities that made such a confusion of tongues in the musical mezzanine, have been dispersed to the uttermost ends of the earth, whence it is to be hoped they may never again be brought together to afflict an unoffending public. The unsuccessful manager threatens to resume operations after Lent, but there is reason to hope that the danger may be averted. The patronage of art in this city have no confidence in Maretzek's ability to produce Italian Opera in a satisfactory manner. His penurious, nonenterprising, snakeshift system did very well fifteen or twenty years ago, but it is not up to the required standard now. Musical culture has advanced wonderfully since that time, and the increased attention paid by the principal theatres to scenery, costumes, and all the minutiæ of the mimetic art, has made the public more exigeant in those respects. Intelligent people will not go to the opera when the entertainment given will not be to delight neither the eye nor the ear. They find no pleasure in listening to one or two tolerably good vocalists when the rest are far below mediocrity, when the chorus sings in several languages, and is only less out of time and tune than the orchestra, and when the stage appointments are meagre and shabby in the extreme. There is not a particle of mystery about the failure of opera in this city. The Shakspearian drama would be as great a failure if it were brought out at Booth's as opera has been at the Academy of Music. There is abundant musical taste to support opera in this city, provided only opera is given in a style worthy of the support. First-class artists, capable and thoroughly disciplined chorus and orchestra, new and attractive scenery, handsome and appropriate costumes, and an energetic, wide-awake management which understands how to cater for a city like this, are all required. With these, Italian opera would be both an artistic and a pecuniary success in New York. Without them, it must continue to be a failure."

The Paris correspondent of the Telegraph sometimes discourses musically. Here is an example:—

"In this highly virtuous city we do not dance in Lent, you know. Public balls take place as usual, of course, and at one place in the Champs Elysées bals ste nuit are advertised to be given twice a week. But no masks are allowed in public by law, and no formal dancing in private is permitted by etiquette till Easter ushers in real summer. Nevertheless, one continues to receive little notes with the words, "On dansera au piano," written timidly in the corner; although on the imposing cards which gradually diminish the utility of your looking-glass, 'On fera de la musique' is the order of the day, and the musique is generally remarkably well faite. An entertainment at which I was present last night comes up to my highest ideal of what a private concert should be. It began at eleven o'clock and was over before midnight. But a concert must be good besides being short. Most true gentils reader, and perhaps you will say, if Mdlle. Nilsson is attractive enough to please you. Here she is the reigning favourite, and she counts her admirers by thousands. Last night she sang a clever cantique, by M. Faure, 'Sancta Maria,' the composer himself accompanying her on the harmonium; and also an extremely pretty melody, of which it would be more permissible to speak warmly if it were not the production of the Marquis d'Aonat, the host of the evening. Then Mr. Tom Hohler sang our old friend, 'When other lips,' to French words, which were thought very nice by the Parisians, who knew 'La Bohémienne,' but which sounded strange to us old fogies who like to hear our 'Bohemian Girl' speak in her vernacular tongue. M. Verger, an excellent baritone, who can sing Rossini's music—des kann nicht sicher—and Mr. Hohler gave 'I Mariani' capitally; and I must not forget a charming violoncelle solo, 'Le Mysosite,' played by M. Lasserre, written by M. d'Aonat. The Marquise only took part in a quartet, as far as music was concerned, but you may be sure that the hostess had a hand in everything extra-musical that could add to the pleasure of her distinguished guests. Many of these were doubly fortunate, in that before the concert of Madame d'Aonat they could enjoy another host's music 'chez la belle Madame Monton,' whom I may be allowed to allude to in the phrase consecrated to her special use in all the French papers, 'Il faut souffrir pour être belle'; and if a lady, not satisfied with all her natural advantages, will use a voice of charming timbre with an exquisite skill and delicate sentiment at the command of few indeed of the world's nightingales, she must not be surprised when she awakes in the morning to find herself famous."

MONACO.—A new opera, Vincigerra, by Sig. Bottesini, has been produced and well received at the Casino.

CONSTANTINOPLE.—Meyerbeer's Dinorah has been brought out with great magnificence, and proved an equally great hit.

TURIN.—Il Favorita, a new opera by Sig. Pedrotti, has been successfully produced. The principal parts were sustained by Mad. Stolz and Sig. Cologni.

SALZBURG.—At the last Museums Concert, Richard Schumann's complete music to Lord Byron's Manfred was performed for the first time in this town.

MILAN.—Il Guarony the new opera by Señor Carlos Gomez, has proved a hit at the Scala. The principal characters were sustained by Madame Sass, Signori Villani, Storti, Coloni, and Maurell.

BRUSSELS.—(From a Correspondent.)—The great event of the day is the first representation, in French, of Wagner's opera, Lohengrin. All the French press was present at this musical solemnity, and the battle is decidedly gained. Lohengrin has obtained a success beyond all expectation. The performance was generally satisfactory, but Miss Sternberg, whom we have already heard in London, created, at this moment a real sensation in Brussels. Indeed, the greatest amount of praise in Lohengrin is due to this young and talented artist. Intelligent, conscientious, and always keeping her part in view, even when in repose she seized and rendered the effect of Elsa in music in the most magnificent style. She infused a feeling of deep poetry, and impressed the stamp of high musical expression by maintaining an irreproachable truth of intonation, and in giving to her voice that mi-dolious and penetrating tone which recently obtained for her such great success in the Huguenots and the Juive. Certainly Wagner would not have written his anti Judaique pamphlet if he had heard a few days ago the notes of our Diva. Her Majesty the Queen sent for Miss Sternberg and very warmly congratulated her.

BADEN.—The arrangements for next season are already settled. On the 1st of May, the Brothers Frémeaux and Mdlle. Motlo will appear at the opening concert. The Italian operatic season will commence on the 15th of the same month. Among the artists engaged are Signore Krauss, Stolz, Laura Harris Materna, Cori; Signori Nicolini, Padilla, and Guadagnini. Sig. Verdi's Forza del Destino is to be produced with a very strong cast. The following artists will take part in the concerts on the 4th, 11th, 18th, and 25th June:—Mesdames Wilhorst, Léon Duval, Secchia; Messrs. Siegmann, Hermann-Léon, Dulcieux, Ketterer, Agnesi, Alard, Bottesini, and Woworsky. On the 8th August, Mdlle. Batiu, Jourdan, Laub, and Rubinstein will appear; and on the 9th September, Mesdames Schröder, Minna Schmidt; MM. Faure, Nicolini, Vieuxtemps, Saint Saëne, and Vivier. In addition to the concerts on the above dates, there will be a grand Matinée Musicale every Friday from July the 1st to August the 12th. The artists engaged for these Matinées are—Pianists: Mesdames H. Lacroix, Anna Dobjansky, MM. Tercili, de la Nux, Ehrlich, and Litolff: Violinists: MM. Freiberg, Heckmann, Levêque, Besekirsky, H. Wehrlé, Sivori, and Mdlle. Liebe; Violoncellists: MM. Norblin and Cossmann.

"A patriotic appeal to Welshmen, by a Welshman. The song—which displays skill, as well as a knowledge of effect—is one of Mr. Richards' most vigorous efforts, and might have been written under the inspiration of 'The Men of Harlech.'"

From the "CARNARVON HERALD."

"With much pleasure we call attention to 'The Cambrian War Song,' one of the most effective compositions we have met with for some time past. The song might be termed a 'scena,' rather than 'a song,' as it is of a more ambitious and broader form of composition than that which is implied by the ordinary term of 'a song.'"

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS. *

(Concluded from page 226.)

Eleven concerts of the second series have already been given. At the first concert the symphony was Mendelssohn's in A minor (the "Scotch"), of which the performance, under the vigilant direction of Mr. Manns, was wonderful for spirit, precision, light and shade, and uniform correctness. If Mr. Manns depended exclusively upon his symphonies he would almost stand alone among conductors. The opening overture was Beethoven's magnificent Coriolan, which, though composed for a tragedy by Herr von Collin, whose patriotic songs are decidedly superior to his tragedies, is still more worthy alliance with the magnificent drama of Shakspere; the second was Weber's fiery and romantic Euryanthe. On the same occasion we hore made Arthur and precocious youths, Masters Arthur and Charles Le Jeune, each played, with singular dexterity, a solo on the organ (one of the most defective in existence)—the former giving Mendelssohn's fourth Sonata (in B flat) the latter J. S. Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E flat, known as "St. Ann's," with well merited applause. The second concert began with Mendelssohn's gentle, fresh, and charming overture to the operetta, Heimkehr aus der Fremde, composed in 1829 (in his 21st year) for the "silver wedding" of his parents, and ended with that of Mr. Arthur Sullivan to an unpublished opera, The Sapphire Necklace, with which, the oftener we hear its overture, the more we are desirous of becoming acquainted. The symphony was Schubert's in C minor—the Tragische Sinfonie, composed in 1816, at the age of nineteen—one of the happy findings of Messrs. G. Grove and Arthur Sullivan in the "dark cellar" at Vienna. Of this enough was said on the occasion of its introduction at the Crystal Palace. As a whole, it improves on closer familiarity; and, if the first movement leaves a little to be desired, the third and fourth as manifestly gain. Nevertheless, we are more and more puzzled to understand Schubert's motive for attaching to his symphony so distinguishing a title—there being literally no element of tragedy in it from one end to another—unless, bearing in mind the very interesting suggestions of "G.," who talks about Schubert and Schumann much as Romeo might have talked about Juliet and Rosaline —Schumann being "G.'s" Rosaline, Schubert his Juliet. Some parts of the symphony are even comic. At the same concert the solo player was Herr Wilhelmj, the violinist, who, in the late Ernst's elaborate fantasia on airs from Rossini's Otello, proved himself an executant of the highest class, and in an arrangement, or rather derangement, for his instrument, of a slow movement from Bach's orchestral Suite in D, showed that the most skilful of executants may also be the unwisest of judges.

At the third concert there was nothing new to speak of, the symphony being Beethoven's No. 8 (in F), the overtures Cherubini's Anacreon and Rossini's Guillaume Tell—the Scherzo and Trio from Schumann's "Op. 52" (Overture, Scherzo, and Finale), making up the complement of instrumental music. Why critics, and more especially "G.," will persist in putting the prelude to Anacreon at the head of Cherubini's overtures, while Faniska, Les deux Journées and others are so well known, is a riddle not over easy to solve. Schumann's Scherzo, by the way, should never be performed apart from the rest of the work, which is a symphony without a slow movement, just as Mozart's in D is already named, is a symphony without a minuet. Besides this, there is a reference in the trio, on its second appearance, to a theme belonging to the first movement—which, without the context, loses its significance entirely. Though it rarely comes to us, in writing of the Crystal Palace, to speak of the solo vocal music, which, for the most part, is destitute of research and inflted for association with the rest, we cannot but mention an Offertorium by Schubert, an early work, produced in the same year as his Erl-König, which, sung by Miss Edith Wynne, was one of the most engaging features of the programme.

The fourth concert was exclusively dedicated to Mendelssohn, the most important pieces being the overture to Athalie, the hymn, "Hear my prayer," and the never-tiring Walpurgis Nacht. To say anything new about these would demand a fertility of invention to which we can lay no claim. The conspicuous piece at the fifth concert was the Historical Symphony of Spohr (in C, No. 6?) an abortive effort to represent, in four successive movements, the styles of Handel and Bach (1720), of Haydn and Mozart (1780), of Beethoven (1810), and of what is somewhat loosely and vaguely denominated "the Modern School" (1840) —in our opinion the most unsuccessful, if at the same time one of the most ambitious attempts of the laborious composer to treat music otherwise than in the abstract. Spohr was a realist—no idealist; and all his endeavours to travel out of his natural domain, the Weise der Tone, in parts, excepted, were fruitless—none more so than the Historical Symphony, which, with certain easily appreciated musical beauties to recommend it, is, in a poetical sense, a notorious failure. Of Mozart's fine and too rarely played overture to Idomeneo, and Schubert's pretty if somewhat attenuated prelude to Alfonso und Estrella, which, at one time served as the overture to Rosamunde—Rosamunde having no overture of its own—we need say nothing. On this occasion our excellent English violinist, Mr. Carrodus, played the first movement of Beethoven's Concerto in D, so admirably as to make every one regret that he omitted any part of the work. At the following concert Herr Joachim played, as usual, superbly; although the concerto he selected—that of Herr Max Bruch, originally introduced at the Philharmonic Concerts in London by Herr Ludwig Straus—is by many degrees more pretentious than interesting. Later in the programme, the greatest of violinists made ample amends by his masterly execution of J. S. Bach's Prelude and Fugue in G minor, from the six unaccompanied solo sonatas. Besides purifying himself on Mount Œta, and becoming a god, could hardly have found a better illustration. Without having undergone the ordeal of fire, Herr Joachim was himself again. Mozart's operative overture to Die Zauberflöte began, and Mendelssohn's fanciful and delicate Meeresstille ended, the concert, another prominent feature of which was Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor. The non completion of this last, its wondrous beauty considered, is the greater enigma, inasmuch as its character proclaims it the symphony in which, beyond all others, Schubert, with his peculiar temperament, must have felt most ardent delight. There is, indeed, nothing more thoroughly Schubertian than these fragments—just as there is nothing more Mendelssohnian than the overture to Meluzine. On the same occasion Miss Edith Wynne sang the great air from Il Sacrifizio d' Abramo of Cimarosa—one of those genuine Italian masters from whose multifarious compositions Mr. Manns would do well to draw more frequently. At the concert preceding a by no means satisfactory performance of Beethoven's only oratorio, Christus am Oelberge (the Mount of Olives), was preceded by an affectedly, so-called, "adagietto," followed by a scherzo, from an orchestral Suite by Herr Joseph Joachim Raff—as rampant a specimen as of Young Germany "as Cherubini's Anacreon himself. Mr. Manns, in the programme, attempts to make out a case for Herr J. J. Raff, as he had previously attempted to make out a case for Herr Rubinstein. He tells us that Herr Raff's Suite "is in no way an imitation of the ancient Suite"—which we can readily believe; but that his "adagietto and scherzo breathe entirely the spirit of our time"—to which we can only reply, so much the worse for our time. Further, Mr. Manns hopes to be able to "introduce the whole work in a future series of Saturday Concerts should the result of to-day's performance be satisfactory;" but, as the result was not at all "satisfactory," we are moved to say, emphatically, to the zealous conductor—don't. Some spirited and highly effective organ-playing by Mr. Archer, who chose Mendelssohn's first Sonata (in F minor), and Bach's grand Prelude and Fugue in E minor, the famous, so-called, "Scissars," was a marked feature of the programme. How insignificant by the side of these sounded the music of Herr Raff!

At the eighth concert, which began with Weber's lively overture to Precioso, and terminated with that of Auber to the opera, La Circassienne (not one of his happiest), Madame Schumann, in her most vigorous and enthusiastic manner, played her late husband's ingenious but strained pianoforte concerto in A minor, and Mendelssohn's Andante and Rondo capriccioso—so beloved of youthful aspirants. The piece of most importance, however, was Professor Sterndale Bennett's symphony in G minor, composed for the Philharmonic Society six years ago, and performed there for the first time at the Crystal Palace. Of this genuine and beautiful work we have spoken more than once. It was welcomed at the Crystal Palace, after a performance creditable alike to Mr. Manns and his orchestra, as it had been welcomed on every previous occasion; and the minuet, which possesses all the "allure" of a timid maiden unconscious of her beauty, and therefore of her fascination, was played twice, by unanimous desire. While we have an Englishman who can write such music we need hardly despair of native art.

At the ninth concert a new overture by Herr Niels Gade, from whom the generous and always hopeful Mendelssohn anticipated so much, and from whom so little of intrinsic value has really come, was introduced; but it is unlikely that Michael Angelo will add to Herr Gade's fame. The other overture was Mendelssohn's most Mendelssohnian Meluzine, which has the disadvantage of being so trying, in certain passages, for the wind instruments especially, that it never can be executed to a nicety. The symphony was Beethoven's No. 4, that ethereal "B flat," to which some dullards would fain allot an inferior place among the glorious "nine," simply because it came between the Eroica and the C minor—whereas it is as true "Beethoven" as anything Beethoven ever composed, and contains, among other things, an adagio which may be described, without hyperbole, as transcendent.

At the tenth concert Mr. Manns had the courage to bring forth that singular monstrosity, the overture, by Hector Berlioz, entitled Les Francs Juges. In a word, this is not music at all, and cannot be criticised as music—despite an elaborate apology put forth in the programme, ending with the subjoined remarkable sentence:—

* From the Saturday Review, April 2, 1870.

"The so-called Sonata-Form in which most overtures are cast has here been largely extended, no doubt through the dramatic tendency of the work, a performance of which cannot fail to afford pleasure to all, and instruction to young composers, on account of the great originality with which the author has designed and carried out his interesting tone-picture. [A.M.]"

We had always regarded the "sonata form" as the purest and most symmetrical that music could assume—the form first suggested in the quartets and symphonies of Haydn, further perfected in those of Mozart, and brought to its highest state of development in the sonatas, quartets, and symphonies of Beethoven. If the Franz Jupes is an example of this form, we must have been all along mistaken. Haydn's early symphonies (before he came to England) and those to compose his twelve grand symphonies for Salomon (1791)*, and in all probability for the exclusive entertainment of Prince Esterhazy—brought back music again, and emboldened people to think that, after all, music was an art like other arts, with rules and so forth. The symphony was played to perfection. The rest of the concert was not so satisfactory. Beethoven's choral setting of Goethe's Meeresstille, so like in design to Mendelssohn's orchestral concert-overture, was very imperfectly rendered; nor could we entirely approve of any part of the execution of Mendelssohn's Walpurgis Night, except the orchestral introduction, which was played admirably, and the solo voice parts, which we have seldom heard more carefully given than by Miss Julia Elten (contralto), Mr. W. H. Cummings (tenor), and Mr. Lewis Thomas (bass).

The concert on last Saturday was interesting for several reasons. The first piece in the programme was Beethoven's overture to Leonora —"No. 1," which might have served all purposes well enough as it stands. Nevertheless, the dis-attraction of the great master can hardly be a source of dissatisfaction to his admirers, seeing that it was the cause of his writing "No. 2" and the magnificent "No. 3"—aye, and "No. 4," in another key, which has really more to do with Fidelio than the majority of critics have hitherto chosen to admit. We place little reliance on the belief in some quarters that this overture, instead of being "No. 1," is really "No. 3." As well might the oak be the origin of the acorn, instead of the acorn being the origin of the oak. That the great Leonora grew out of the two other overtures in C, it only requires the three to be heard in succession, as Mendelssohn contrived on one occasion at the Leipsic Gewandhaus Concerts, to convince us. At all events let us thank the Crystal Palace musical authorities for occasionally bringing forward "No. 1" and "No 2," as well as the more familiar "No. 3"—and "No. 4," the popular representative overture to Beethoven's opera. The symphony of this concert was one by Dr. Ferdinand Hiller, in E minor and major, to which the author has affixed the motto, "Es muss doch Frühling werden," from the poet Geibel.† This symphony—a work of remarkable ability—if no very striking originality—is known not only to Germany but to London, being dedicated by its composer to the defunct Musical Society of London, at one of whose concerts, in 1865, it was performed under the direction of the late regretted Alfred Mellon—a born English conductor, if there ever was one. Upon the motto, which simply means that Spring must come in some Mr. Manns, in the programme, builds up what he calls "a poetical illustration of the combat between Winter and Spring"—wholly without the authority of the composer, who in the strongest terms repudiates conventional "programme-music." Dr. Hiller asserts that his symphony is a piece of music which people may interpret as they please; and that if it suggests anything in particular to them he is only too happy. What matters? It is, as we have hinted, a masterly composition; and though the first movement gives us some notion of the overture to Mendelssohn's Walpurgis Night, lengthily and indefinitely spun out, the three remaining movements are as genuine and fresh as they are musically charming. The performance was singularly good—so good, indeed, that, on its account alone, we could have forgiven Mr. Manns even a longer "poetical analysis" than he has written. Moreover, the audience, if we may judge by their applause, seemed to like the new symphony; and its reception was of such a nature that it may reasonably be awarded a place in some future programme. Another feature at this concert was Signor Randegger's very impressive dramatic scena, "Medea," originally produced at the Norwich Festival of 1869, and there admirably sung by Mdlle. Tietjens—but now still more admirably sung by Madame Rudersdorff. On this occasion, as at Norwich, the performance of "Medea" was directed by the composer himself, and its reception was deservedly enthusiastic. An Adagio and Rondo for violin and orchestra, composed, and the solo part executed, by Herr Franz Ries, nephew of the late Ferdinand Ries, Beethoven's favourite pupil, call for no especial remark. The overture at the end of the programme was that

* The year of Mozart's death.

† Who wrote the libretto for Mendelssohn's unfinished Loreley, which Herr Max Bruch had the temerity to set to music.

‡ Weber's Jubel-Cantate, written for the festivities at Dresden in 1818, to celebrate the fiftieth year of the reign of Frederick August of Saxony. The final theme of this overture is, as all amateurs know, the tune of the Saxon national hymn, which is identical with that of our own "God save the Queen."

Of the vocal music at the Crystal Palace concerts (to which we have here and there referred), it is enough to say that, while good singers are occasionally engaged and good music occasionally produced, it is by no means to be spoken of in the same terms as the instrumental. Criticism apart, however, the Monday Popular Concerts excepted, there are no public entertainments of the kind which promote the cause of legitimate art in anything like so effective a manner as the Saturday performances under the direction of Mr. Manns. In a very short time they will be suspended; and then comes the reign of Italian Opera-singers—as if we had not enough of these, at precisely the same period, in the heart of London.

OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

MDLLE. SESSI.

The opinion of the Pall Mall Gazette with regard to this young artist is expressed as follows:—

"It was in the Lucia of the evening, however, that the interest of the public was above all centred. We have heard so much of Mdlle. Sessi's golden hair, and have been kept so well informed by foreign journals of the excellent qualities of Mdlle. Sessi as an artist, that the effort produced last night, personally and artistically, had nothing in it which could, strictly speaking, be called surprising. We were prepared for a success, and a success was indeed achieved. Mdlle. Sessi's hair is long, plentiful, and beautifully fine; while her voice is extensive, sympathetic, and something more than fair. It is, indeed, a soprano voice of the purest and finest quality; deficient perhaps in power, but certainly not wanting in sweetness. Without following Mdlle. Sessi too closely through the various pieces in which Lucia takes part, we will simply say that she sang the cavatina of the first act gracefully, and that she was becomingly sentimental in the well-known duet which closes that act; that she again distinguished herself in the dramatic duet with Ashton, and above all in a well-developed and highly dramatic concerted piece which forms an effective a termination to Act 2; but that in Act 3 we must see Mdlle. Sessi displayed all her hair, and with it all her power. Not that the force of Mdlle. Sessi resides (Samson-like) in her hair alone; but personal appearance is always something in a prima donna, and if the back hair is to be let down at all, it is well, no doubt, it should be bright and beautiful. For this mad scene Mdlle. Sessi had also reserved her voice, which, alike resonant and flexible, seemed to lend itself easily to the feats of 'agility' required by a due performance of the music. In fine the débutante made a success. The audience appreciated her, applauded her, and (what is sometimes even more important) appeared to like her."

On the same subject the Daily Telegraph says:—

"Nobody acquainted with what goes on in the artistic world of Paris needs information about the antecedents of Mdlle. Mathilde Sessi. How she recently succeeded in making for herself a good position in the French capital, and among those who boast that they are hard to please, is pretty well known. Mdlle. Sessi came to us, therefore, with a certain character to sustain, and with the task before her of having to satisfy decided expectations. Let us say at once that she has done both. Her choice of a work was well advised. Lucia di Lammermoor is familiar and popular; its music proved thoroughly adapted to the new-comer's voice and style; and the work secured an incidental advantage which, though trifling, must not be overlooked. The fame of Mdlle. Sessi's hair is nearly as great as that of her voice. In Paris the 'glory' of the young Austrian has not been her least attraction; and who can tell how many in the crowded audience of last night waited impatiently for the mad scene which was to display its full extent? These were not disappointed, if there be anything in luxuriant growth and uncommon length. Mdlle. Sessi's hair is a decided feature in her representation of Donizetti's distraught heroine. As a singer, the débutante was not long in finding favour. Her opening phrase was somewhat marred by the nervousness incidental to her position; her features lack mobility; but it can no more be denied that they are always agreeable to look at than that, in other respects, physical disadvantage is amply counterbalanced. It must be said, however, that throughout the scene of the malediction, Mdlle. Sessi showed, at most, but a promise of future dramatic excellence. Happily, her career is all before her, and that promise may be fulfilled. The young artist, as we have hinted above, was quite successful in winning the favour of her audience. Called on after each act, she was frequently applauded with an enthusiasm about which there could be no mistake."

LORD DUDLEY AND THE FESTIVALS.

With reference to the letter of Lord Dudley, quoted by us last week, the Sunday Times observes:—

"There is nothing whatever of novelty in the above arguments; and to answer them is simply to travel over well-trodden ground. Lord Dudley lays much stress on the fact that the nave of the Cathedral is now used for purposes of worship; and that, during the Festival, worship has to be conducted in the Lady Chapel. Setting aside the obvious reply that a prayer in the Lady Chapel is probably just as efficacious as one in the nave, we are ready to grant that, under certain conditions, Lord Dudley's argument would have cogency. Undoubtedly, the first use of a cathedral is for worship; and to that use everything else is bound to give way. If, therefore, such crowds attended the daily services of Worcester Cathedral that only the spacious nave could hold them, the Festivals could not take place with propriety. But what are the facts? Does not every one acquainted with cathedral towns know that the average attendance at a week-day service is ridiculously small, and that nine cathedral congregations out of ten might easily find accommodation in a side chapel? Thus being the case, we entirely fail to see the least cogency in the first portion of Lord Dudley's letter. The noble earl talks much about 'desecration;' but by admitting his assertions we should like to have the word 'desecration' authoritatively defined. The Pharisees used to employ the word largely, and we all know that their notion of its meaning and that of the Founder of Christianity differed widely. In justice to Lord Dudley let us observe that he seems conscious of the weakness of this part of his case, and grants that it is possible for good men to believe, without thereby incurring reproach, that the Festivals do not desecrate the church. Here, then, we have a mere question of opinion which can be set aside.

"We now come to Lord Dudley's remarks upon the future prospects of the Charity in the event of no more festivals being held. On this point Lord Dudley is so sanguine that we must credit him with firm faith in the disinterested goodness of humanity. He believes that benevolent Samaritans would flock to Worcester from all parts of the country to attend an ordinary cathedral service (with an augmented choir), and to have the pleasure of dropping sovereigns into a plate. It grieves us to say it, but we know, and our readers know, that not even benevolent Samaritans would do anything of the kind. The service-festival would dwindle down to the level of an ordinary charity sermon, and the outermost ripple of the commotion made by it would not extend beyond the municipal bounds of Worcester. But Lord Dudley goes on to say that the Charity is well off for funds. We are glad to hear it, because it shows the efficacy of the present system. But will Lord Dudley pretend that the Charity is doing all that needs to be done? Are there no widows and orphans in the three dioceses whose pittance is too small, or who have not yet had their claims considered? If there are, let Lord Dudley agitate for a more liberal expenditure; and very soon, we opine, the plethora of wealth to which he refers would be relieved."

THE HUNGARIAN CONCERTO.

Apropos of Herr Joachim's work as played at the Philharmonic Concert, we read in the Pall Mall Gazette:—

"Formed upon the largest scale, this work is one of large pretence; but pretence goes not very far beyond actual achievement. Herr Joachim's design is obvious. Besides the production of a work cast in the highest artistic form, he sought to give a national colouring to his music, and at the same time to afford opportunity for a display of executive ability. At least two of these three objects are fully secured. The virtuosity necessary to an adequate performance of the concerto is such that Herr Joachim has, and is likely to have, a monopoly of the work. Every conceivable device calculated to test a violinist's powers to the severest degree is crowded into Herr Joachim's score. The composer might call his work Ne Plus Ultra without fear of a Plus Ultra to follow. As regards the national colour of the concerto we are quite prepared to believe in its truthfulness. That Herr Joachim could invent such peculiar scales, and such strange rhythmic forms, we think he must be if he could, is improbable, to say the least. Whatever may be the shortcomings of the work, apart from these things, there can be no doubt that these things help to make amends. The first movement, for example, is developed at too great length; but interest in it is kept up by astounding difficulty and peculiar themes, as well as by merits of a higher order. That more exalted qualities are not at all few let Mr. Macfarren witness: 'Rare indeed are the works, even of the magnitude of this, whence so many distinct themes might be quoted, each of which is characteristic, each attractive, and each has a special beauty of its own. The setting forth of these manifold ideas is masterly, and imagination is equally evinced with scholarship in their diversified elaboration.' This is high praise, but critics who do not go so far as the analyst must admit praise to be deserved. They cannot deny, for example, the melodic beauty of the romance, the sustained animation of the finale, and the masterly use of the orchestra best exemplified in the extended introduction to the first solo. These things are sufficient to secure for Herr Joachim's work more than ordinary respect. Their chief reflex action, however, is towards Herr Joachim himself. The concerto must remain, for the most part, a curiosity; but the composer may be expected to produce music which shall have a current value. At all events, his gifts are beyond dispute. Herr Joachim's performance was wonderful even to those least acquainted with the difficulties overcome, and it will stand out from among the achievements of the season as a thing altogether unique."

SIGNOR VIANESI.

The Pall Mall Gazette speaks as follows of the new chef d'orchestre at the Royal Italian Opera:—

"Of the new conductor, Signor Vianesi, we have nothing to say, except that he comes from St. Petersburgh. the orchestra of which capital (as at several other capitals in Europe) is declared (by the inhabitants) to be the finest in the world. In any case, Signor Vianesi is not out of place at the Royal Italian Opera, where he has, under his guidance, an orchestra worthy of any conductor. Of course, a St. Petersburgh chef d'orchestre knows how to conduct the music of Lucia, and equally of course a Covent Garden band knows how to execute it."

NEW PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

The second New Philharmonic concert took place in St. James's Hall, on Wednesday evening, when the following was the programme:—

PART I.

Overture (Im Italienischen Style)	...	...	...	...	Schubert.
Concerto, in A minor, for violin and orchestra—violin, Madame Norman-Neruda	...	...	...	...	Viotti.
Recit. ed Aria, "Quando miro"—Mdme. Patey	...	...	...	...	Mozart.
Symphony in A, No. 7	...	...	...	...	Beethoven.

PART II.

Concerto, in D minor, for pianoforte and orchestra—pianoforte, Herr Reinecke	...	...	...	...	Mozart.
Aria, "Ah s'estinto"—Madame Patey	...	...	...	...	Mercadante.
Solo, Fugue, Gigue, and Courante—violin, Mdme. Norman-Neruda	...	...	...	...	Rust.
Overture (Abou Hassan)	...	...	...	...	Weber.

The overture by Schubert, Im Italienischen Style, pleased Dr. Wylde's audience, no less than it had already pleased the audience of the Crystal Palace Concerts, when performed under the direction of Mr. Manns. The symphony in A major was, of course, the feature of the evening. The violin concerto served to introduce Madame Norman-Neruda to the New Philharmonic audience. Her execution of this, as well of a prelude by Rust (a rusty old German composer), was extraordinary.

Herr Reinecke (conductor of the celebrated Gewandhaus Concerts at Leipsic) gave the pianoforte concerto in a style which must have charmed every lover of Mozart's music. The cadenzas introduced were models of what such impromptu displays should be—in keeping with the author, yet withal brilliant and effective. The vocal music introduced by Madama Patey was much applauded. Dr. Wylde conducted the orchestra; and Herr Ganz, accompanied Madame Neruda's solo on the pianoforte.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—GOOD FRIDAY.

Good Friday will this year present unusual attractions at the Crystal Palace. In addition to the concert, the entire series of fountains will be played, Howes & Cushing's zoological collection, including their cleverly-trained wolves, horses, monkeys, &c., will be located on the grand centre walk. The grand concert, which takes place on the Handel Orchestra at half-past three, conducted by Mr. Manns, comprises an unusual array of talent. The following are the principal artists:—Madame Rudersdorff, Mdlle. Carola, Madame Florence Lancia, Mdlle. Drasdil, Mr. Vernon Rigby, Signor Urio, Signor Foli, Mr. Aynesley Cook, Mr. Thos. Harper, &c. Besides the band of the Company, the band of the Royal's Artillerist (conducted by Mr. J. Smyth) will take part, and will also play selections of sacred music from two o'clock. Special arrangements have been made to run trains as often as required throughout the day. The Palace will be open for admission from nine in the morning till nine at night. It has been mentioned that the directors contemplated the addition of fresh and salt water aquariums on a complete scale. It has been decided to establish the series adjacent to the Tropical Department, leading to the Conservatories and Orangery, thus forming an unrivalled promenade upwards of eight hundred feet in extent. These aquariums will be open to the public by the end of March next year.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

On Monday week the following was the programme:—

PART I.

Quartet, in E flat, Op. 47, for pianoforte violin, viola, and violoncello—Madame Schumann, MM Joachim, Straus, and Piatti	Schumann.
Song—Miss Annie Sinclair	Schubert.
Variations, in C minor, Op. 36, for pianoforte alone—Madame Schumann	Beethoven.

PART II.

Serenade Trio, for violin, viola, and violoncello—MM. Joachim, Straus, and Piatti	Beethoven.
Song—Miss Annie Sinclair	Mendelssohn.
Double Quartet, for four violins, two violas, and two violoncellos—MM. Joachim, L. Ries, Politzer, Wiener, Straus, Zerbini, Paque and Piatti	Spohr.

We are not disposed to discuss once more the much contested merits and demerits of Schumann's quartet. Most amateurs have, by this time, made up their minds about it, and while some reverence the work as an inspiration, others regard it as simply pretentious. Both parties, however, must agree that the quartet should have an occasional hearing, and that it should be heard with the attention due to an important work by a remarkable composer. On Monday Schumann had an advantage in his executants, who left nothing to desire by way of completing a perfect interpretation. How many converts were made from doubt to belief is a matter for conjecture. Madame Schumann's performance of Beethoven's variations was just what those who know her powers may easily imagine. The lady has her own way of doing things, and, supported by the hearty applause of an admiring public, she need not trouble to change it. On this occasion there could be no doubt that her energetic playing delighted the audience. Beethoven's serenade trio is so familiar to the Monday Popular habitués that we need not stop to say a word about it. The light and graceful music was heard with as much pleasure as ever, and had a rendering absolutely without flaw. Spohr's double quartet constituted the most important feature in the programme. It is a work which justifies the lavish praises even of the composer's warmest friends. We note in its regular con-truction, pleasing themes, developed with masterly ease and effect, and an imaginativeness of the very highest order. Spohr has handled his two quartets very happily; they dovetail into each other, while each fulfils an individual purpose, after a fashion that must always command admiration. We shall be glad to hear this beautiful work again, and often as the director can make it convenient. Miss Annie Sinclair delivered her songs with a fair degree of taste and skill.

At the concert on Saturday afternoon, Madame Schumann played Beethoven's sonata in E (Op. 109), before joining Herr Joachim and Signor Piatti in the same composer's D major trio (Op. 70). Herr Joachim gave the much too frequently heard Romance in G; and, being encored, substituted the much too frequently heard Romance in F. The last instrumental piece was the string quintet in C (MM. Joachim, Ries, Straus, Zerbini, and Piatti). Miss Blanche Cole was the singer; and the concert being intended to celebrate the centenary of Beethoven's birth, the songs, like all the rest, were selected from his works.

ROTTERDAM.—A Symphony by Herr Bargiel was very favourably received at the sixth concert of the Kruditio Musica Society.

DARMSTADT.—A comic opera—by Herr Steinhart—entitled Hero und Leander, is announced for production. It has already been successfully performed in Magdeburgh.

STETTIN.—Among the most noticeable events of the season just concluded may be mentioned the visit of Herr Joachim, who, as usual, delighted and astonished his audience; the performances of the Florentine Quartet; the pianoforte playing of Mdlle. Laura Kahrer, a fair young prodigy of fourteen; and the execution of Mendelssohn's Elijah and Handel's Judas by the Musical Society.

LEIPSIC.—The programme of the last Gewandhaus Concert this season contained the following works:—"Requiem æternam," from Cherubini's Requiem (in memory of Ignatius Moscheles); overture to Medea, Cherubini; air from Euryanthe, C. M. von Weber (sung by Herr Max Stägemann, from the Theatre Royal, Hanover); "Mirjam's Siegesgesang," for soprano solo and chorus, Franz Schubert (scored by Franz Lachner; the solo sung, for the first time, by Mdme. Peschka-Leutner); and Symphony, "An die Freude," in D minor, Op. 9 (L. van Beethoven), the solos sung by Mad. Peschka-Leutner, Mdlle. Minna Borée, Herren Rebling and Stägemann.—A rich merchant, Pierre Louis Sellier, has bequeathed 1,000 thalers to the Musicians' Pension Fund, and 500 to the Conservatory of Music.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The following programme was gone through at this society's second concert in St. James's Hall, on Wednesday week:—

PART I.

Symphony in D	Mozart.
Recit. "Sposa, Euridice" (Orfeo)—Madame Osborne Williams	Gluck.
Aria, "Che farò" (Orfeo)—Madame Osborne Williams	Gluck.
Concerto in D minor for violin—Herr Joachim ...	Joachim.
Recit. "And God said, Let the waters" (Creation)—Miss Katharine Poynts	Haydn.
Air, "On mighty pens uplifted soars" (Creation)—Miss Katharine Poynts	Haydn.
Overture, "Ruy Blas"	Mendelssohn.

PART II.

Symphony in F (No. 8)	Beethoven.
Two-part song, "Autumn Song," Op. 63 (No. 4)—Miss Katharine Poynts and Madame Osborne Williams	Mendelssohn.
Overture, "Chevy Chase"	G. A. Macfarren.

Mozart's symphony in D is one of the works written at the request —which, to the composer's fitful nature, was the command—of an exacting father. At Vienna, in 1782, Mozart had but recently established himself in what seemed a hopeful position; and he was in love. No wonder, than, that the symphony is so bright and joyous that it seems to bubble over with pleasurable excitement, or that it communicates the same feeling to all who hear it. Criticism of a work so well known would be out of place; and we have only to say that it was admirably played and heartily enjoyed. Herr Joachim's violin concerto, "in the Hungarian manner," had only twice before been given in London, and then, for reasons obvious enough to those who know it, by the composer himself. Herr Joachim was again the soloist, and we can hardly find laudation strong enough to be worthy his marvellous performance. The music seems written as if in an attempt to exhaust the inexhaustible powers of the violin, and hence the opportunity for a display of skill astonishing even to those best acquainted with Herr Joachim's capacity. Whether it was pathetic melody, bravura passages which seemed to fly all over the instrument, double stopping of the most intricate nature, or octaves at first sight impossible, the great violinist was never at a loss, never even laboured at his task. As an exhibition of virtuosity nothing could be more perfect. With regard to the concerto itself, we are hardly in a position to adjudge its merits. Herr Joachim's plan compelled him to work according to the characteristics of Hungarian music, and, till we know exactly what those characteristics are, we cannot tell how far they influenced him. If, therefore, there be anything in the concerto peculiar or seemingly without purpose, it is only fair to the composer to ascertain whether he or the "Hungarian manner" is answerable. But, putting all this on one side, we have, happily, plenty left to admire which needs no special knowledge for its admiration. For example, the grand "Tutti" at the opening of the work; the lovely strain that now and then breaks the impetuosity of the first movement; the charming romance, "so full of character and beauty that it might well become a national song;" and much of a finale wherein we are conscious that nationality is fully and vigorously expressed. We regret, in view of these things, that nobody but Herr Joachim is likely to play the concerto, and hope that a composer so able will devote himself to music more practicable. It can hardly be requisite to state that Herr Joachim was applauded as he deserved. Mendelssohn's overture, always welcome, had an encore not only warranted by the music, but by one of the best performances we can remember. The vigour and precision with which it was given may claim the highest praise. Beethoven's symphony was also well played. In point of fact, Mr. Cusins's orchestra now bids fair speedily to be worthy the distinguished society with which it is connected—a result due not only to the individual capacity of the members, but also to the talent of their conductor. Chevy Chase is a work which does honour to English art. By-the-bye, may we suggest to the directors that, when next they select an English composition of importance, it will be quite pardonable in them to indulge a little national pride, and place the work elsewhere than at the fag-end of the programme? Miss Katharine Poynts and Madame Osborne Williams were both received with favour.

LIEGE.—The Russian violin virtuoso, Beseklirsky, played recently at a concert given by the Philharmonic Society, and created a favourable impression both as a player and as a composer.

VIENNA.—Herr O. Freyer, Capellmeister at the Cathedral, has just received the Commander's Cross of the Papal Order of St. Sylvester, in recognition for his efforts to improve Church music.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The directors followed up the production of Mdlle. Sessi on the opening night by playing Les Huguenots on Saturday, in order that Herr Wachtel might appear as Raoul, for the first time in England. This is vigorous work; and shows pretty clearly that Covent Garden means to make an impression while yet it has everything its own way. The public are not likely to grumble in consequence, for they will reap advantage, whatever may be the resultant good or ill fortune of the house. There was a crowded audience to hear the second, and, as not a few think, the greatest of the triad of great works which, written in Meyerbeer's prime, will carry Meyerbeer's name down to posterity.
